CONTENTS OF BOOK VI

While Alexander was winning victories in Asia there were disturbances in Greece and Macedonia. Agis, king of Lacedaemon, urges the Greeks to throw off the Macedonian yoke while the Persians still had power to resist. With money from Pharnabazus and Autophradates he hired mercenaries, and taking advantage of Antipater's absence in Thrace, won over to his side nearly the whole Peloponnesus and raised an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse. Antipater settled the war in Thrace on the best conditions he could and from the friendly and allied cities of Greece raised 40,000 troops. He sent messengers to Alexander informing him of the revolt and the king sent him money and ships. The beginning of the war was favourable to the Lacedaemonians. The final battle was hotly contested, but after Antipater constantly sent fresh troops to the aid of his hard-pressed men, the Lacedaemonians began to give ground. Thereupon Agis with the royal cohort, his bravest men, rushed into the thick of the fight.

A description of the battle. Agis fights valiantly, but is slain. The Greek army is defeated and the revolt collapses. Antipater, knowing Alexander's spirit, did not venture to act as arbiter, but left that to a council of the Greeks. The Lacedaemonians through envoys gain pardon from Alexander (i).

Alexander, invincible in war, is overcome by leisure and pleasure. His adoption of foreign habits gave offence to his own countrymen and led to conspiracies and mutinies. He favours those of his prisoners who are of high birth. A rumour arises that the king thinks of returning to Macedonia (ii).

Alexander reviews what he has accomplished, tells his men what remains to be done and urges them to bring the war to a triumphant conclusion (iii).

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, VI

The soldiers are aroused by his eloquence and bid him lead them wherever he will. He takes advantage of their enthusiasm and marches through Parthienê to Hyrcania. A description of the Stiboetes river. Nabarzanes in a letter asks for pardon, which is granted. A description of the Caspian Sea (iv).

Alexander receives Artabazus with great courtesy, spares the Greeks who had aided Darius, defeats the Mardi, and entertains a queen of the Amazons (v).

The Macedonians are offended by Alexander's habits. To prevent a mutiny he plans to make war upon Bessus. He must first put down a revolt of Satibarzanes, whom he had made satrap of the Arii. He drives the barbarians from the mountains, takes Artacana, and marches against the Drangae (vi).

Dymnus reveals a conspiracy against Alexander to Nicomachus, who through his brother Cebalinus reports it to Alexander. Dymnus kills himself (vii).

Philotas, son of Parmenion, is charged by Alexander's friends with forming the conspiracy. He is arrested and taken to the king's quarters (viii).

Alexander addresses the soldiers about the conspiracy. Some of the leaders make charges against Philotas. When the accused is asked whether he wishes to make his defence in the Macedonian language or in Greek, he prefers to reply in Greek (ix).

Philotas denies the charges (x).

Bolon rouses the soldiers against Philotas. A confession is forced from him by torture, and he is stoned to death with the other conspirators (xi).

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT OF MACEDON

BOOK VI

While this was happening in Asia, not in Greece either nor in Macedonia was there complete quiet. There was ruling among the Lacedaemonians Agis, son of Archidamus, who, while bearing aid to the Tarentines, was slain on the same day that Philip defeated the Athenians at Chaeronea.^a Agis, a rival of Alexander in valour, was spurring on his citizens not to allow Greece to be longer oppressed by slavery to the Macedonians ; unless they took precaution betimes, the same yoke would pass to them. They ought therefore to bestir themselves while the Persians still had some strength for resistance ; when they were crushed, the Lacedaemonians, faced by an immense power, would in vain be mindful of their ancestral freedom. When their minds had been thus aroused, the Lacedaemonians sought for an opportunity of beginning war. Accordingly, encouraged by Memnon's^b successful result, they began to join in his plans, and after he was taken off in the beginning of a prosperous career by an untimely death, they did not act with any less vigour.

But Agis went to Pharnabazus and Autophradates, and obtained thirty talents of silver and ten triremes, which he sent to his brother Agesilaüs, in order that he might sail to Crete, the inhabitants of which island were divided by conflicting interests between the Lacedaemonians and the Macedonians. Envoys were sent also to Darius, to ask for a greater sum of money for carrying on the war and more ships.. And these plans of theirs the defeat at Issus—for that had meanwhile happened—was so far from interrupting, that it even helped them. For Alexander, in his close pursuit of the fleeing king, was being hurried to more distant places, and from the battle itself a great number of mercenaries had fled to Greece; and of these Agis with his Persian money hired 8000, and by their help recovered numerous cities of the Cretans.

Next, after that, when Menon, sent by Alexander into Thrace, had stirred up the barbarians to revolt, and Antipater, to suppress it, had led an army from Macedonia into Thrace, promptly taking advantage of the opportune time, the Lacedaemonians brought over to their side the entire Peloponnesus with the exception of a few cities, and mustering an army of 20,000 infantry and 2000 cavalry, conferred the chief command upon Agis. Antipater, on learning of this action, settled the war in Thrace on the best terms he could make, and hastily returning to Greece, got together what troops he could from the friendly and allied cities. When these had assembled he counted a force of 40,000 soldiers. A strong band also had come from the Peloponnesus; but since he knew that their loyalty was doubtful, concealing his suspicion, he thanked them for having come to defend the prestige of Alexander against the Lacedaemonians; he said that he would write this to the king, who in due time would requite them. That at present there was no need of greater forces; therefore they might return to their homes, having fulfilled the obligation of their treaty. Then he sent messengers to Alexander, to inform him of the uprising in Greece.

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, VI

These at last overtook Alexander at Bactra, when in the meantime the revolt had been ended by Antipater's victory in Arcadia and the death of Agis.

The king, having learned long beforehand of the rebellion of the Lacedaemonians, had provided for it so far as he could when separated by the extent of so many lands; he had ordered Amphoterus with Cyprian and Phoenician ships to sail to the Peloponnesus, Menes to take 3000 talents to the sea-coast, in order that from near at hand he might supply Antipater with as much money as he should learn that he needed. For he had rightly perceived how greatly that move would tip the scales of Fortune's balance for all his plans; although later, after having received news of Antipater's victory, he jestingly remarked, comparing that battle with his own exploits, that it had been a fight with mice. However, the first stages of that war had not been without success for the Lacedaemonians. Near Corrhagum, a fortress of Macedonia, having encountered Antipater's soldiers, they had come off victors; and because of the fame of that success those also who had looked upon the fortune of the rebels with doubting minds had allied themselves with them. Pellenë alone of the cities of Elis and Achaia rejected the league, and in Arcadia, Megalopolis, being faithful to the Macedonians because of the memory of Philip, from whom they had received favours. But that city was besieged and was on the point of surrender, had not Antipater at last come to their aid. He, after comparing camp with camp and seeing that he was superior in number of men and in other equipment, decided to fight a decisive battle as soon as possible; and the Lacedaemonians did not decline the contest.

Accordingly, a battle^a took place, which greatly damaged the Spartan cause. For when, trusting to the narrowness of the plain in which they fought, where they believed that the enemy would have no advantage from their superior numbers, they attacked most valiantly and the Macedonians resisted most vigorously, there was great bloodshed. But after Antipater from time to time sent a fresh force to aid his hard-pressed men, the army of the Lacedaemonians was forced to give way, and drew back for a while. Agis, on seeing this, with the royal cohort, which was made up of his bravest men, I. plunged right into the danger-point of the fight, and cutting down those who resisted most bravely, drove a great part 2 of the enemy before him. The victors had begun to flee, and until they brought the enemy, who pursued them too eagerly, down into the level ground, they were falling unavenged; but no sooner was there standing-room, than they fought on equal terms.^a 3 Among all the Lacedaemonians, however, their king was conspicuous, not only for the excellence of his arms and his person, but also for the greatness of his 4 courage, in which alone he was unsurpassed. On all sides, now hand to hand, now at long range, he was attacked, and for a long time, turning his arms now here, now there, he caught some of the weapons with his shield and avoided others by his agility; but at last his thighs were run through by a lance and from 5 great loss of blood failed him as he fought. Therefore his guards laid him upon his shield and quickly carried him back to his camp, hardly able to endure the effect of the jolting on his wounds.

6 Yet the Lacedaemonians did not give up the fight, but as soon as they could gain ground more favourable to themselves than to the enemy, they took close order and met their line of battle as it poured 7 like a flood upon them. That no contest was ever more desperate is a matter of record. The armies of the two nations most famed in war were fighting 8 on even terms ; the Lacedaemonians had an eye to their ancient, the Macedonians to their present glory, the one side was fighting for freedom, the other, for dominion, the Lacedaemonians lacked a 9 leader, the Macedonians room for fighting. Also, so many shifting changes in a single day increased now the hope, now the fear of both sides, as if Fortune were purposely balancing a struggle between the 10 bravest of men. But the narrowness of the place in which the battle remained fixed did not allow them to engage with their full strength ; therefore more looked on at the contest than took part in it, and those who were out of range of a weapon urged on 11 their men in turn by their acclamations. At last the army of the Laconians, who were barely able to hold their weapons slippery with sweat,^a began to weaken, 12 then to retreat. Next, when they fled more openly, as the enemy pushed on, the victor followed them closely, scattered as they were, and passing at the double over all the space which the Laconians' army had held, was in pursuit of Agis himself.

13 He, when he saw the flight of his men and the foremost of the enemy, gave orders to be put down, and having tried whether his limbs could follow the 14 desire of his spirit, and feeling that they failed him, he sank upon his knees, and quickly putting on his helmet, and protecting his body with his shield, he brandished a spear in his right hand, actually challenging anyone who would dare to despoil him as he lay the outcome of the war, which broke out suddenly, yet was ended before Alexander overcame Darius at Arbela.

II. But Alexander, as soon as a mind which was better qualified for coping with military toil than with quiet and ease was relieved of pressing cares, gave himself up to pleasures, and one whom the arms of the Persians had not overcome fell victim to their 2 vices : banquets begun early,^a the mad enjoyment of heavy drinking and being up all night,^b and troops of harlots. There was a general slipping into foreign habits. By emulating these, as if they were preferable to those of his country, he so offended alike the eyes and the minds of his countrymen, that by many of 3 his former friends he was regarded as an enemy. For men who held fast to^c their native discipline, and were accustomed with frugal and easily obtained^d food to satisfy the demands of nature, he had driven to the 4 evil habits of foreign and conquered nations. Hence the more frequent making of plots against his life, mutiny of the soldiers, and freer expression of resentment amid mutual complaints, then on his own part now anger, now suspicions aroused by groundless fear, and other similar evils, of which an account will 5 be given later. Alexander, therefore, when he was wasting days and nights alike in early and prolonged banquets, used to relieve the satiety of his feasts with entertainments, not content with a throng of artists^e whom he had summoned from Greece ; for captive women were bidden to sing after their manner a song discordant and hateful to foreign ears.^f

- 6 Among these women the king himself noticed one more sad than the others, who modestly resisted those who would lead her forward. She was of surpassing beauty, and her modesty enhanced her beauty; with downcast eyes and with her face covered so far as she was allowed, she aroused in the king a suspicion that she was of too high birth to be exhibited amid

On being accordingly asked who she was, she replied that she was the granddaughter of Ochus, who had lately been king of the Persians, being the daughter of his son, and that she had been the wife of Hystaspes. He had been a kinsman of Darius and himself the commander
- 8 of a great army. There still lingered in the king's mind some remains of his former disposition; and so, respecting the ill-fortune of a lady born of royal stock, and so famous a name as that of Ochus, he not only gave orders that the captive should be set free, but also that her property should be returned to her; likewise that her husband should be looked for, in order that when he had been found, he might restore
- 9 his wife to him. Moreover, on the following day he ordered Hephaestion to cause all the prisoners to be brought to the palace.^a There, having inquired into the rank of each one, he separated from the common herd those who were of high birth. There were a thousand of these; among them was Oxathres, brother of Darius, no more distinguished because of the rank of that king than for his own mental endowments.

ran as though crazed to their tents and made ready their packs for the journey ; you would believe that the signal to march ^a had been given throughout the whole camp. Here the noise of those looking for their tent-mates, there of those loading the wagons, was 17 borne to the king's ears. The Greek soldiers who had been bidden to return to their homes had gained credence for the report which had been circulated without reason ; since 6000 denarii ^b had been given to each of their horsemen, and 1000 to every man of their infantry, the rest of the army believed that the 18 end of military service was at hand for themselves also. Alarmed, as was natural, the king, who had determined to traverse the lands of the Indi and the remotest parts of the Orient, summoned the leaders of his forces to his tent, and, with tears in his eyes, complained that he was being recalled from the mid-course of his glory, to take back to his native land the fortune of one who was vanquished rather than 19 that of a victor ; that it was not cowardice on the part of his soldiers that stood in his way, but the envy of the gods, who had inspired in the bravest of men a sudden longing for their native land, to which they would return a little later with greater glory and fame.

20 Then indeed each general individually offered his service, demanded the most difficult tasks, promised also the obedience of the soldiers, if the king would consent to soothe their feelings by a mild and appropriate ^c address ; that they had never held back spiritless and downcast, whenever they had been able to draw upon his enthusiasm and the inspiration of so great a mind. Alexander replied that he would do it ; only let them in advance prepare the ears of

 4 and Parthienê. The provinces of which I have taken possession outnumber the cities which others have captured, and I verily believe that in enumerating our exploits their very number has caused me to 5 forget some of them. Therefore, if I believed that the possession of the lands which we have so quickly subdued were wholly secure, I myself, my soldiers, even if you wished to hold me back, would rush to my home, to my mother and sisters, and to the rest of our fellow countrymen, in order that there rather than elsewhere I might enjoy with you the praise and glory which we have won, where the richest rewards of victory await us, the happiness of our children, wives and parents, the repose of peace, the sure possession of the fruits of our valour.

Do you believe that so many nations accustomed to the rule and name of another, united with us neither by religion, nor customs, nor community of language, have been subdued in the same battle in which they were overcome?^c It is by your arms that they are restrained, not by their dispositions, and those who fear us when we are present, in our absence will be enemies. We are dealing with savage beasts, which lapse of time only can tame when they are caught and caged, 9 because their own nature cannot tame them. And I am so far speaking as if our arms had subdued everything that was under the sway of Darius. Nabarzanes has taken possession of Hyrcania, the murderer Bessus not only holds Bactra, but he also threatens us; the Sogdiani, Dahae, Massagetae, Sacae, and Indi are independent. All these, as soon as they see our backs,

We certainly committed a sin, soldiers, if we conquered Darius for the purpose of turning over the sovereignty to his slave, who, having dared the worst of crimes, held his king in fetters, like a captive, even when he was in need of aid from without, and whom we, the victors, would surely have spared, and finally slew 14 him in order that he might not be saved by us. Will you suffer such a man to rule ? A man whom I, for my part, am in haste to see nailed to a cross,^c thus paying a well-deserved penalty to all kings and

IV. The address was received with the greatest enthusiasm of the soldiers, who bade him lead them 2 whithersoever he wished. Nor did the king delay their ardour, but two days later he made his way through Parthienê to the borders of Hyrcania,^d having left Craterus with the forces under his command and the band which Amyntas was leading, besides 600 horsemen and the same number of archers, to protect Parthienê from any inroad of the 3 barbarians. He ordered Erigyius to conduct the baggage by the route through the plains, having given him a moderate escort. He himself with the phalanx and the cavalry, after traversing 150 stadia, fortified a camp in the valley through which one enters Hyrcania. There is a grove shaded by a dense growth of very tall trees, where the rich soil of the valley is watered by streams which flow from mountains the Stiboetes River gushes forth, which flows as a single stream for a distance of nearly three stadia, then, dashed against a rock which obstructs its little channel, it forms two branches, as if by 5 a distribution of its waters. From there a torrent, made more violent by the rough stones over which it runs, it plunges headlong under the earth. For 300 stadia it glides on in a hidden course, and again, as if reborn from another source, it comes to the surface and cuts a new channel, wider than its former 6 one—for it expands to a width of thirteen stadia—and once more contracts its course within narrower banks. At last it empties into another river; it is 7 called the Rhidagnus. The natives asserted that whatever articles had been thrown into the cavern which is nearer the river's source come out where the other mouth of the river opens; therefore Alexander gave orders that oxen be thrown in where the waters go under the earth, and those who were sent to intercept them saw their bodies thrown out where the river bursts forth again.

8 Alexander had already given the soldiers a rest for the fourth day in the same place,^a when from Nabarzanes, who with Bessus had taken Darius prisoner, he received a letter, of which this was the purport ^b: That he had not been an enemy of Darius, quite on the contrary, he had given him what he believed to be salutary advice, and because he had given the king faithful counsel, he had barely escaped 9 with his life. That Darius had meditated handing over the guardianship of his person to foreign soldiers, contrary to what was just and right, distrusting the loyalty of his own subjects, which for two hundred and thirty years they had preserved inviolate to their

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, VI. iv. 10-16

- 10 kings. For his own part, standing as he was on dangerous and slippery ground, he had taken counsel from his immediate necessity. Darius also, when he had killed Bagoas,^a had satisfied his countrymen with this excuse, that he had killed the eunuch because 11 he was plotting against him. That nothing was more precious to wretched mortals than life; that it was from love of this that he had been driven to extremities. But those acts he had yielded to, rather than desired. In a general calamity each man has regard to his own fortune.
- 12 If Alexander should order Nabarzanes to come to him, he would come without fear. He had no apprehension that so great a king would violate a pledge which he had given; the gods were not wont 13 to be deceived by a god. But if Nabarzanes should be thought unworthy of receiving a pledge, many places of exile were open to his flight; wherever a brave man has chosen his home, there is his native 14 land. Alexander did not hesitate to give a pledge, in the manner in which the Persians were wont to receive them,^b that if he should come, he would be unharmed.

Nevertheless Alexander went on with his army in square formation ^c and in good order, sending scouts ahead from time to time, to reconnoitre the country.

15 The light-armed troops led the march, the phalanx followed them, after the infantry was the baggage.^d Both the warlike race and the nature of their position, which was difficult of access, had put the king 16 on his guard. For there is a continuous valley extending as far as the Caspian Sea, to which arms, so to speak, of that land jut forth^e; these, bending slightly in the middle, form a curve very like the Cercetae and the Mossyni, and the Chalybes are on the left,^b and on the other side the fields of the Leucosyri and the Amazons^c; and it looks towards the latter where it slopes towards the north, to the 18 former when it is turned towards the west. The Caspian Sea, which is fresher than others,^d breeds serpents of huge size; the colours of the fish in it are very different from others. Some call it Caspian, others Hyrcanian^e; there are still others who think that the Maeotic pool empties into it, and they advance as evidence the water, because it is fresher than the other seas, since the water from the pool which has flowed into it tempers its saltness.

 19 Towards the north a great sea rushes upon the shore, drives its waves far, and like a rising tide forms a pool of great extent; but in another condition of the weather^f the sea retires into itself, and with the same force with which it poured in, it flows back and restores the land to its natural condition. And some have thought that this is not the Caspian Sea, but that the Ocean makes its way from India into Hyrcania,^g whose high land, as was said before, sinks into an uninterrupted valley.

- yet since no enemy met them, they passed through, 21 and finally came to more cultivated places. Besides other supplies, of which the region then had an abundance, a huge amount of fruits is grown, and 22 the soil is very rich in producing grapes. A kind of tree which is common there resembles an oak, the leaves of which are bedewed with a great deal of honey^a; but unless the natives gather it before sunrise, the sap is destroyed by even a moderate warmth.
 23 From there Alexander had advanced for thirty stadia, when Phrataphernes met him, surrendering himself and those who had fled after the death of Darius; having received them courteously, the king came to the town of Arvae. There Craterus and 24 Erigyius met him. They had brought Phradates, governor of the tribe of the Tapuri; he also was received under protection, and was an example to many in entrusting themselves to the king's clemency.
 25 Then Alexander made Amminaspes^b satrap of Hyrcania; he had come to Philip as an exile during the reign of Ochus. Alexander also restored the tribe of the Tapuri to Phradates.

V. And already the king had entered the farthest part of Hyrcania, when Artabazus, who, as we have said before,^c had been most faithful to Darius, met him with his own children and the relatives of Darius, 2 as well as with a small band of Greek soldiers. On his arrival the king offered him his right hand; for he had been a guest of Philip when he was in exile in the reign of Ochus, but the loyalty to his king, which he had maintained to the end, prevailed over the pledges 3 of guest-friendship. Being therefore affably greeted, he said: "May you for your part, king, I pray the gods, enjoy perpetual happiness; I, though in all other respects happy, am grieved by this alone, that because of hastening^a old age I cannot long enjoy 4 your kindness." He was in his ninety-fifth year. Nine young men, all born of the same mother, accompanied their father ; these Artabazus caused to take^b the king's right hand, praying that they might live 5 so long as they might be helpful to Alexander. The king generally made a journey on foot ; on that occasion he ordered horses to be brought for himself and Artabazus, in order that the aged man might not feel ashamed to ride a horse while the king himself went on foot.

6 Then, after a camp had been pitched, the king ordered the Greeks whom Artabazus had brought to be called together ; but they replied that unless a pledge of safety was given also to the Lacedaemonians and to the men of Sinopê,^c they would con-7 sider what step they ought to take. These had been sent as envoys of the Lacedaemonians to Darius, and after the defeat of that king had attached themselves to the Greeks who were serving as mercenaries with 8 the Persians. The king, having given them no pledges of protection nor promises, ordered them to come to him and to accept such fortune as he himself would give them. After long hesitation and many changes of mind,^d they finally promised that they 9 would come. But Democrates,^e an Athenian, who had always been prominent in opposing the Macedonian power, despairing of pardon, fell upon his sword. All the rest, as they had decided, surrendered 10 at discretion to Alexander. They numbered 1500 soldiers,^f and besides these, ninety who had been sent as envoys to Darius. The soldiers were distributed as additions to the king's troops, the rest were sent home except the Lacedaemonians whom he ordered to be held under guard.

- 11 The Mardi were a race bordering on Hyrcania,^a a people of rude habits of life and accustomed to brigandage ; they alone had neither sent envoys, nor seemed likely to be obedient to orders. Hence the king, piqued by the thought that one race might prevent him from having been "invincible," having left the baggage with a guard, went on, accompanied
- 12 by a strong force. He had made the march by night, and at daybreak the enemy was in sight ; it was rather a tumult^b than a battle. Dislodged from the hills of which they had taken possession, the barbarians fled, and the nearest villages, deserted by their inhabitants,
- 13 were taken. The interior parts of that region, however, could not be approached without greatly fatiguing the army ; ranges of mountains, lofty forests, and impassable rocks shut them in, and such parts as are level the barbarians had obstructed by a novel
- 14 kind of fortification. Trees are purposely planted close together ; while their branches are still tender, they bend them down with their hands, twist them together, and again insert them in the earth ; then, as if from another root, more vigorous trunks spring.
- 15 They do not allow these to grow in the direction which Nature carries them, but they join them together, as if interlacing them. When they are clad in abundant foliage, they hide the ground ; and so the secret snares, so to speak, of the branches
- 16 shut in the road by a continuous hedge. The only expedient was to cut an opening into the woods, but this too was a task of great difficulty. For the many knots had hardened the trunks, and the interlaced branches of the trees, like so many suspended festoons, by their tough interwoven shoots would bring to naught the strokes of the axe.

- 17 The natives, however, being accustomed to crawl under the thickets like wild beasts, then also had entered the woods and from concealment were assailing their enemy with weapons. Alexander, tracing them to their lairs as hunters do, slew many of them, and finally ordered the soldiers to encircle the forest, and to rush in if they could find an opening anywhere ;
- 18 but in the unknown country many of them strayed and lost their way, and some were captured, among them the king's horse—they called him Bucephalas ^a—which Alexander valued more highly than all other animals. For he would not allow anyone else to sit upon his back, and when the king wished to mount him, he knelt down of its own accord to receive him,
- 19 and seemed to know whom he was carrying. Therefore aroused with greater anger than was seemly and at the same time with grief, the king gave orders that the horse should be traced, and that proclamation should be made through an interpreter, that unless it should be returned, not a man would be left alive. Terrified by this threat, along with other
- 20 gifts they brought the horse. But not even by this made milder, the king ordered the woods to be cut down and earth to be brought from the mountains and heaped upon the plain which was made impass-
- 21 able by the branches. And this work had already risen to a considerable height, when the barbarians, despairing of being able to hold the region which they had occupied, surrendered their nation. The king, after having received hostages, ordered them to submit to Phradates.
- 22 Then, four days later, the king returned to his permanent camp. From there he sent Artabazus home, after conferring on him double the honour which Darius had paid him. Now they had come to the city of Hyrcania in which the palace of Darius had been ^a; there Nabarzanes, having received a safe

Among these was Bagoas,^b a eunuch of remarkable beauty and in the very flower of boyhood, who had been loved by Darius and was afterwards to be loved by Alexander; and it was especially because of the boy's entreaties that he was led to pardon Nabarzanes.
 24 There was, as was said before,^c neighbouring on Hyrcania, a race of Amazons, inhabiting the plains of 25 Themiscyra, about the river Thermodon. They had a queen, Thalestris, who ruled all who dwelt between the Caucasus mountains and the river Phasis. She, fired with a desire to visit the king,^d came forth from the boundaries of her kingdom, and when she was not far away sent messengers to give notice that a queen had come who was eager to meet him and to become acquainted with him. She was at once given permis-26 sion to come. Having ordered the rest of her escort to halt, she came forward attended by three hundred women, and as soon as the king was in sight, she herself leaped down from her horse, carrying two 27 lances in her right hand. The clothing of the Amazons does not wholly cover the body; for the left side is nude as far as the breast, then the other parts of the body are veiled. However, the fold of the robe, which they gather in a knot,^e does not

- 29 With fearless expression Thalestris gazed at the king, carefully surveying his person, which did not by any means correspond to the fame of his exploits ; for all the barbarians feel veneration for a majestic presence, and believe that only those are capable of great deeds whom nature has deigned to adorn with 30 extraordinary physical attractiveness. However, on being asked whether she wished to make any request, she did not hesitate to confess that she had come to share children with the king,^a being worthy that he should beget from her heirs to his kingdom ; that she would retain any female offspring but would return 31 a male to his father. Alexander asked her whether she wished to serve in war with him ; but she, giving as an excuse that she had left her realm without a guard, persisted in asking that he should not suffer 32 her to go away disappointed in her hope. The passion of the woman, being, as she was, more keen for love than the king, compelled him to remain there for a few days. Thirteen days were spent in satisfying her desire. Then she went to her kingdom, and the king to Parthienê.

- VI. It was in fact at this time^b that Alexander gave loose rein to his passions, and changed continence and self-control, eminent virtues in every exalted fortune, to haughtiness and wantonness.
2 Regarding his native customs and the discipline of the Macedonian kings, wholesomely restrained and democratic,^c as too low for his grandeur, he strove to rival the loftiness of the Persian court, equal to 3 the power of the gods ; he demanded that the victors over so many nations in paying their respects to him should prostrate themselves upon the ground, and gradually sought to accustom them to servile 4 duties and to treat them like captives. Accordingly, he encircled his brow with a purple diadem, variegated with white ^a such as Darius had worn, and assumed the Persian garb, not even fearing the 5 omen of changing from the insignia of a victor to the dress of the conquered. In fact, he used to say that he was wearing the spoils of the Persians ; but with 6 them he had assumed also their customs, and insolence of spirit accompanied the magnificence of his attire. The letters also which were to be sent to Europe he sealed with the device of his former ring ; on those which he wrote to Asia, the ring of Darius was impressed, so that it appeared that one mind 7 was not equal to the fortune of the two realms. Moreover, he compelled his friends, the cavalry,^b and with them the leaders of the soldiers, to wear the 8 Persian dress, which was indeed repugnant to them, but which they did not dare to refuse. Three hundred and sixty-five concubines, the same number that Darius had had, filled his palace, attended by herds of eunuchs, also accustomed to prostitute themselves.

 9 These practices, corrupted by luxury and foreign customs, were openly detested by the veteran soldiers of Philip, a people novices in voluptuousness, and in the whole camp the feeling and the talk of all was the same, namely, that more had been lost by victory 10 than had been gained by war ; that it was then above all that they themselves were conquered men, when they had surrendered themselves to alien and foreign habits. With what face, pray, would they return to their homes, as if in the attire of prisoners ? The king was already ashamed of them since, resembling the vanquished rather than the victors, he had changed from a ruler of Macedonia to a satrap of 11 Darius. The king, not unaware that the chief of his friends, and the army as well, were grievously offended, tried to win back their favour by liberality and by bounty. But, in my opinion, the price of 12 slavery is hateful to free men. Therefore, that the situation might not result in mutiny, it was necessary to put an end to their leisure by war, the material for which was opportunely increasing.^a 13 For Bessus, having assumed regal attire, had given orders that he should be called Artaxerxes,^b and was assembling the Scythians and the rest of the peoples dwelling by the Tanais.

This was announced by Satibarzanes, whom Alexander had received under his protection and had made satrap of the region which he had formerly governed.
 14 And since the army, laden with spoils and the equipment of luxury, could with difficulty be moved, he ordered first his own baggage, then that of the whole army, to be gathered together in their midst, except 15 what was absolutely necessary. There was a spacious plain, into which they had driven the loaded wagons. When all were wondering what the king was going to order next, he commanded that the animals be led away, and, when he had first applied a torch to his 16 own pack, that the rest be burned. There were consumed, set on fire by their owners, the riches to save which unharmed from the cities of the enemy they had often extinguished flames, and no one dared to weep for the price of his blood, when the 17 same fire was consuming the king's wealth. Then in a short time reason soothed their grief, and, prepared for military service and ready for everything, they

 19 grief to all. The king, saddened more than the others, desired to halt in order to be present at his funeral, but scarcity of supplies caused him to hasten; therefore, leaving Philotas with 2600 men to perform the due rites for his brother, he hurried on to meet Bessus.
- 20 As he was on his way, letters were brought to him from the neighbouring satraps, from which he learned that Bessus was in fact coming to meet him with hostile intent with his army, but also that Satibarzanes, whom he himself had given charge of the 21 satrapy of the Arii, had revolted from him.^a Therefore, although eager to meet Bessus, yet thinking it best to make it his first business ^b to crush Satibarzanes, he led out his light-armed troops and his cavalry forces, and marching swiftly all night, came 22 unexpectedly upon the enemy. On learning of his arrival ^c Satibarzanes with 2000 horsemen—for he had not been able in his haste to muster more—fled for refuge to Bactra, the rest took possession of the 23 neighbouring mountains. There is a rock, very steep on its western side, but towards the east sinking with a gentler slope; covered with many trees, it has a perennial fount, from which there is an abundant flow of water. Its circuit covers thirty-24 two stadia. On its summit is a grass-covered plain; on this they ordered those who were not fit for war to take their places. They themselves piled tree-trunks and stones on the slope of the rock. They 25 numbered 13,000 armed men. Leaving Craterus to blockade these, he hastened in pursuit of Satibarzanes. But because he had learned that the barbarian was a long distance away, he returned to storm those who had taken possession of the mountain 26 heights. And first he ordered to be cleared whatever road they would be able to traverse^a; then, when impassable crags and precipices presented themselves, the labour seemed hopeless against the op-27 position of Nature. But Alexander, being always of a mind to wrestle with difficulties, since to advance was a hard task and to return dangerous, considered all kinds of expedients as his mind suggested one after another—as is usual when we reject every first thought.

As he was at a loss, chance offered a plan which cal-28 culation could not suggest. There was a strong west wind, and the soldiers had cut a great amount of wood when trying to make an approach over the stones. This, dried by the heat, had caught fire; 29 therefore he ordered other trees to be piled on, and fuel to be given to the flames, and soon, as the trunks were heaped up, they equalled the height of 30 the mountain. Then fire was thrown upon it from every side and kindled the whole mass. The wind drove the flames into the faces of the enemy, a great 31 smoke had hidden the sky as if by a cloud. The woods roared from the conflagration, and those parts also to which the soldiers had not set fire, took fire themselves, and burned everything that was near them. The barbarians tried to escape the worst of torments, if the fire died down anywhere, but where the flames gave a passage the enemy awaited them.

 32 Hence they were destroyed by varied forms of death; some threw themselves into the midst of the flames, others down from the rocks, some offered themselves to the hands of the enemy, a few, half roasted, came into their power.

33 From there he returned to Craterus, who was besieging Artacana.^a He, having prepared everything beforehand, was awaiting the coming of the king, leaving to him the honour of capturing the city, 34 as was right. Therefore Alexander ordered towers to be brought up; and at the mere sight the terrified barbarians on the walls, stretching out their hands, palms up, began to entreat him to reserve his anger for Satibarzanes, the ringleader of the revolt, and to spare the suppliants who surrendered themselves. The king pardoned them, and not only put an end to the siege,^b but returned all their property to the inhabitants.

35 When he had left this city, a reserve ^c of new soldiers met him; Zoilus had brought 500 soldiers from Greece, Antipater had sent 3000 from Illyricum, with Philip there were 130 Thessalian cavalry, from Lydia 2600 foreign troops had come, and 300 horse-

36 men of the same race followed. With the addition of these forces he entered the land of the Drangae, a warlike tribe. Their satrap was Barzaentes, an accomplice with Bessus in the crime against his king; he, fearing the punishment which he had deserved, fled to India.

was attacked by a crime within his own household.
2 Dymnus, a man of slight weight and favour with the king, burned with love for a catamite named Nicomachus, bound by the compliance of a body devoted 3 to him alone. He, as if in great alarm, as could clearly be seen also from his expression, without witnesses withdrew with the youth into a temple, first saying that he had something secret and confidential to communicate, and when the youth was on tiptoe 4 of expectation, he besought him by their affection for each other, and by the pledges which they had both exchanged, to declare under oath that he would keep silent about what Dymnus should reveal to him.
5 Nicomachus, not supposing that he would tell anything which it would have been perjury for him to have revealed, took oath by the gods in whose temple 6 they were. Then Dymnus revealed that a plot against the king had been arranged for the third day thereafter, and that he shared in that design with 7 some brave and distinguished men. The youth, on hearing this, steadfastly denied that he had pledged his faith to take part in treason,^a and said that he could not be bound by any religious obligation to 8 keep the crime secret. Dymnus, mad both with love and with fear, seizing the youth's hand and weeping, begged first that he would take part in the design 9 and its execution ; if he could not bring himself to do that, at least that he would not betray him, whose goodwill towards Nicomachus, besides all the rest, had this very evident proof, that he had trusted his life to his loyalty without previously testing it.
10 Finally, when the youth persisted in expressing abhorrence of the crime, Dymnus tried to terrify him by fear of death, saying that the conspirators would

- 12 Then applying a drawn sword, now to Nicomachus' throat and now to his own, at the same time a suppliant and an enemy, Dymnus at last forced him to promise, not only silence, but even support.
- 13 Yet the lad, being of a most steadfast spirit—indeed he should have been chaste—had made no change in his former resolution, but pretended that, overcome with
- 14 love for Dymnus, he could refuse him nothing. Then he went on to inquire with whom he had entered upon an association of so great importance; it made a great deal of difference, he said, what sort of men were going to put their hands to so memorable an
- 15 enterprise. Dymnus, almost crazed by love and guilt, at the same time thanked him, and also congratulated him that he had not hesitated to join with the bravest of men, Demetrius, one of the body-guard,^a Peucolatus, Nicanor; to these he added Aphobetus, Iolaüs, Theoxenus, Archepolis, Amyntas.
- 16 On being dismissed from this conference, Nicomachus reported to his brother—his name was Cebalinus—what he had heard. They agreed that Nicomachus should stay in his brother's tent, for fear that, if he, who was not accustomed to approach the king, should enter the royal apartment, the conspirators might learn that they had been betrayed.
- 17 Cebalinus himself stood before the vestibule of the tent—for nearer access was not allowed him—waiting for someone of the first rank ^a of the king's friends, 18 to admit him to Alexander's presence. It happened that when the rest had been dismissed, Philotas, son of Parmenion, alone—it is not known for what reason —had remained in the royal apartment; to him Cebalinus, in confused words and showing signs of great perturbation, disclosed what he had learned from his brother, and asked that it be reported to the 19 king without delay. Philotas, after strongly commending him, at once went in to Alexander, and having talked with him for some time about other matters, reported nothing of what he had learned 20 from Cebalinus. Towards evening the young man met Philotas in the vestibule of the royal apartment, as he was coming out, and asked him whether he had done what he requested. Philotas alleged that the king had had no time to talk with him, 21 and went away. On the following day Cebalinus was on hand when Philotas came to the royal apartment, and reminded him, as he entered, of the matter which he had communicated to him the day before. Philotas replied that he was attending to it, but did not even then disclose to the king what he 22 had heard. Cebalinus began to suspect him, and so, thinking that there ought to be no further obstruction, he told a young nobleman—his name was Metron—who had charge of the armoury, of the 23 crime which was being planned. He, after having concealed Cebalinus in the armoury, at once revealed to the king, who chanced to be taking a bath, what 24 the informer had reported. The king sent his attendants to arrest Dymnus, and entered the armoury.

 There Cebalinus, transported with joy, said: "I

- 25 men." Then Alexander, after inquiring about all the particulars, learned the whole matter in detail. And again the king went on to inquire how long it was since Nicomachus had given him the information. And when Cebalinus admitted that it was two days before, Alexander, thinking him of doubtful loyalty in reporting so long afterwards what he had 26 heard, ordered that he be put in fetters. But Cebalinus began to cry out that at the very moment that he had heard of it he had run to Philotas; that it was by him that what he had learned was concealed.
- 28 When the king asked again and again whether he had gone to Philotas, and whether he had urged him that they should go to Alexander, and Cebalinus persisted in affirming what he had said, the king, raising his hands to heaven, with flowing tears began to lament that such requital had been made him by one who had formerly been the dearest of his friends.
- 29 In the meantime Dymnus, well aware why he was summoned by the king, gave himself a severe wound with a sword which he chanced to be wearing, and being stopped by the guards who ran up, was 30 brought into the royal apartment. The king, looking him in the eye, said: "What great wrong have I planned against you, Dymnus, that you should think Philotas more worthy to rule the Macedonians, than I am myself?" But speech had already failed Dymnus; and so, uttering a groan and averting his face from the king's gaze, he forthwith swooned and died.
- 31 The king, having ordered Philotas to come to the royal tent, said: "Cebalinus deserved the extreme penalty, if he concealed for two days a plot aimed at my life; but he has substituted Philotas as the one guilty of that offence, since he declares that he immediately reported the information to him.

32 The closer the degree of friendship which you have with me, the greater is the crime of your secrecy, but I at any rate admit that such action becomes Cebalinus rather than Philotas. You have a favourable judge, if what ought not to have been done can at least be excused."

33 To these words Philotas, in no wise disturbed, if his feelings were judged from his expression, replied that Cebalinus had, it was true, reported to him the talk of a wanton, but that he himself put no trust in an authority of so little weight, fearing besides lest he should be laughed at by the rest if he reported

34 a quarrel between a lover and his favourite; but since Dymnus had made away with himself, it ought not to have been passed over in silence, whatever its nature was. Then, throwing his arms about the king, he began to entreat him to have regard to his past life rather than to a fault which, after all, was only 35 one of silence, and not of any action. I could not readily say whether the king believed him, or suppressed his anger deep in his heart; he offered him his right hand as a pledge of renewed favour, saying that it appeared to him that the information was scorned rather than concealed.

VIII. Then, having called a council of his friends, to which however Philotas was not invited, he ordered 2 Nicomachus to be brought before it. The youth set forth in order the same information that his brother had given to the king. Craterus was dearer to Alexander than most of his friends, and for that reason less friendly to Philotas, as his rival in import-wearied the ears of Alexander by excessive vaunting of his valour and his services, and hence was sus-4 pected, not indeed of crime, but of arrogance. Thinking that there would be no more advantageous opportunity of ruining his enemy, disguising his hatred under a pretence of loyalty, he said : " I only wish that at the very beginning of this matter you 5 had deliberated with us ! We should have persuaded you, if you wished to pardon Philotas, to suffer him to be ignorant how much he was indebted to you, rather than, after he had been brought even to the very fear of death, to think more often of his own danger than of your kindness. For he will always be able to plot against you, you will not always be able to pardon 6 Philotas. There is no reason for you to think that one who has dared so much can be changed by a pardon. He knows that those who have exhausted 7 mercy can no longer hope for it. But even if he himself, either through change of heart or overcome by your kindness, shall wish to remain quiet, I at any rate know that his father Parmenion, the leader of so great an army, and because of his long-continued influence with his soldiers holding a position not much below the height of your greatness, will not with equanimity 8 owe his son's life to you. There are some favours which we hate. One is ashamed to admit that one has deserved death ; therefore, Philotas would prefer to seem to have suffered an injury rather than to have been granted his life. Therefore be sure that you 9 will have to fight with those men for your life. There are enemies enough left, in pursuit of whom we are about to go ; guard yourself against domestic foes.

 If you get rid of these, I fear nothing from without."

10 Thus spoke Craterus. And the rest did not doubt

- that Philotas would not have suppressed the evidence of the conspiracy, unless he had been its ringleader or a participant in it. For who, if a loyal man, and of good intention, not to say a friend, but even one of the lowest condition, on hearing what had been revealed to Philotas, would not at once have hastened
- 11 to the king? To think that the son of Parmenion, as commander of the cavalry ^a a confidant of all the king's secrets, was not moved even by the example of Cebalinus, who had announced to him what he had learned from his brother! That he also pretended that the king had no time to talk with him, for fear that the informer might seek another intermediary!
- 12 Nicomachus, even though bound by an oath to the gods, had hastened to unburden his conscience ^b; Philotas, after spending the whole day in amusement and merriment, had found it difficult to find room, in so long and perhaps superfluous a talk, for a few words
- 13 relating to the life of his king! But, he says, he did not believe mere boys who brought such information. Why then did he prolong the time for two days, as if he had faith in their testimony? Cebalinus ought to have been dismissed, if Philotas rejected his in-
- 14 formation. In the time of his own danger everyone ought to have great courage; when fears were felt for the safety of their king, they ought to be credulous and to listen even to those who bring false information.
- 15 All therefore decided that Philotas should be put to the torture, in order that he might be forced to name the participants in the crime. The king dismissed them, after admonishing them to keep silent about his plans. Then he ordered a march to be announced for the following day, lest any indication

 17 Then in the second watch, when the lights had been put out, there came to the king's tent, with a few others, Hephaestion, Craterus, Coenus, and Erigyus, these from the number of his friends, and from the body-guard Perdiccas and Leonnatus. By these it was ordered that those who were on guard at the king's 18 tent should remain on watch and under arms. Already cavalry had been stationed at all the entrances, and they had been ordered also to beset the roads, in order that no one might secretly go out to Parmenion, who was then governing Media and was in command 19 of great forces. Atarrhias, moreover, with 300 armed men had entered the royal tent; to him were given besides ten attendants,^a each followed by ten men-20 at-arms. These were sent in different directions to arrest the other conspirators. Atarrhias was sent with 300 men to Philotas and set about breaking open^b the closed entrance to his house, attended by fifty of the bravest of his soldiers; for he had ordered the rest to surround the house on all sides, for fear that Philotas might be able to slip out by a secret 21 door. But he, either through absence of anxiety or worn out by fatigue, had been overcome by sleep: Atarrhias seized him while he was still drowsy.
 22 When at last he was fully awake and chains were put upon him, he said: "O Sire, the bitterness of my enemies has prevailed over your kindness." And without further words on his part they led him with veiled head into the king's quarters.

- 23 On the following day the king made proclamation that all should assemble under arms. About 6000 soldiers had come, besides these a crowd of camp-servants and batmen had filled the royal quarters.
- 24 The men-at-arms covered Philotas with their troop, in order that he might not be seen by the general
- 25 throng until the king had addressed the soldiers. In accordance with the ancient custom of the Macedonians, the king conducted the inquiry into criminal cases, and the army passed judgement—in time of peace it was a duty of the common people—and the power of the king availed nothing, unless his influence
- 26 had earlier had weight with them. Accordingly, the corpse of Dymnus was first brought in, the greater number being ignorant what he had attempted or by what chance he had been killed. IX. After this the king entered the assembly, manifesting his sorrow by his expression. The sadness of his friends also caused
- 2 no slight expectation of what was to take place. For a long time the king stood with his eyes fixed upon the ground, like one amazed and at a loss. At last, having recovered his spirits, he said :

“ Almost, my soldiers, have I been wrested from you by the wickedness of certain men ; for it is by the providence and mercy of the gods that I still live. And the sight of your revered assembly has forced me to be more violently angry with the traitors, since the first, nay, the sole enjoyment of my life is to be able still to requite so many valiant men who have the 3 highest claim upon my gratitude.” His speech was interrupted by the soldiers’ lamentations, and tears sprang to the eyes of all. Then the king continued :

“ How much greater emotion shall I rouse in your minds, when I reveal the authors of so great a crime !

- 7 are moved by devotion or by anger. Then Nicomachus and Metron and Cebalinus were brought forward, and set forth what each of them had reported. By the testimony of none of these was Philotas designated as a participant in the crime. Therefore after the expression of indignation the rest of the speech was heard in silence.
- 8 The king continued: "What, then, seems to you to be the spirit of a man who suppressed the information which was brought to him about this matter—information which the death of Dymnus shows not
- 9 to have been unfounded? Cebalinus, when reporting an uncertain matter did not fear torture, and Metron was so far from putting off even for a single moment the freeing^a of his mind, that he even forced his way

- would he listen anxiously to the informer of so great 11 a matter? No doubt this silence conceals a purpose, and the eager hope for royal power drove his mind headlong to the worst of abominations. His father governs Media; he himself, because of the great power which through my influence he has with many leaders of our forces, aspires to greater things than 12 are within his capabilities. He scorns even my bereavement, in that I have no children. But Phi-lotas is mistaken. In you I have children, relatives, kinsmen; while you live, I cannot be without off-13 spring." Then he read an intercepted letter which Parmenion had written to his sons Nicanor and Philotas, which did not, it is true, furnish evidence of 14 any serious design. For this was its substance^a:
 "First, look out for yourselves, then for yours; for thus we shall accomplish what we have planned." 15 And the king added that the letter was written in such terms, in order that, if it should reach his sons, it could be understood by their accomplices, or if it should have been intercepted, it would deceive those who knew nothing of the plot. Then the king continued: 16 "But, it may be said, Dymnus, when he revealed the other participants in the crime, did not name Philotas. This, in fact, is a sign, not of his innocence, but of his authority, because he was so feared even by those by whom he could be betrayed, that when they confessed their own guilt, they nevertheless did not name him. Furthermore, his own life shows the 17 character of Philotas. He it was who, when Amyntas,

He, when I had written to him, by right of so close a familiarity and friendship, the nature of the reply which had been given by the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, had the impudence to reply that he for his part congratulated me that I had been received into the number of the gods, but that he pitied those who would have to live under one who rose above the 19 limitations^b of a man: These are tokens of a mind which is both long since alienated from me and is also envious of my glory. These things, soldiers, so long as it was possible, I buried in my own thoughts. For it seemed to me that I was tearing away a part of my own flesh, if I should make those upon whom I had conferred such great favours more worthless in my 20 sight. But it is no longer mere words that must be punished; rashness of language has passed on to swords. These, if you believe me, Philotas has whetted against me, if you believe him, he has allowed it.

To your hands, to your weapons I flee for refuge ; I do not wish to be safe, if you do not wish it, if you do wish it, I cannot be unless I am avenged."
- 25 Then he ordered Philotas to be brought in with his hands bound behind his back and his head veiled in a faded cloak. It was readily apparent that men were touched by the wretched plight of one who shortly before had been looked upon with envy.
- 26 The day before they had seen him the commander of the cavalry, they knew that he had been present at a banquet with the king ; suddenly they beheld him on trial, it is true, but already condemned, nay,
- 27 even in bonds.^a There entered their minds also the ill-fortune of Parmenion, so great a general,^b so distinguished a citizen, who, recently bereft of two sons, Hector and Nicanor,^c would, though absent, make his plea along with the only son whom
- 28 calamity had left him. Accordingly Amyntas, one of the king's generals, again aroused the assembly, which was inclined towards pity, by a harsh speech against Philotas, saying that they had been betrayed to the barbarians, that no one would return to his wife, to his native land, to his parents, but that like a body bereft of its head, without life, without name, in a foreign land they would be the sport of their
- 29 enemies. The speech of Amyntas was by no means so pleasing to the king as the author of it had hoped, since by having reminded them of their wives and of their native land he had made them less alert for performing the tasks which remained.
- 30 Then Coenus, although he had joined Philotas'

 31 was a traitor to king, to country, to the army, and catching up a stone which chanced to be lying at his feet, he was on the point of hurling it at him, as many thought because he desired to save him from torture. But the king stayed his hand, declaring that the accused ought to be given the opportunity of first 32 pleading his cause, and that otherwise he would not allow him to be judged. Then Philotas, when ordered to speak, either through consciousness of guilt or beside himself and thunderstruck by the greatness of his peril, did not venture to lift his eyes 33 or to open his mouth.^a Then, with a flood of tears, he swooned and fell into the arms of the man who was holding him ; and when his eyes had been dried with the cloak which he was wearing, he gradually recovered his breath and his voice and seemed about to

 35 upon Philotas replied : " Besides the Macedonians there are many present who, I think, will more easily understand what I shall say if I use the same language which you have employed,^c for no other reason, I suppose, than in order that your speech might be 36 understood by the greater number." Then said the king : " Do you not see how Philotas loathes even the language of his fatherland ? For he alone disdains to learn it. In fact, the best judge of my cause is not present; why he should not wish to hear me himself, I cannot, by Heaven ! imagine,^b since after having heard both sides of the case, he can as readily condemn me as acquit me, but if he has not heard both sides, I cannot be acquitted in his absence since I 4 was condemned by him when he was present. But although the defence of a man in fetters is not only superfluous but also odious, since he seems not to inform the judge but to accuse him, nevertheless, in whatever manner I am allowed to speak, I shall not myself fail, nor let myself seem to have been con-5 demned by my own voice as well. For my part, I do not see with what crime I am charged; no one among the conspirators names me, Nicomachus said nothing about me, Cebalinus could not know more than he 6 had heard. And yet the king believes me to have been the head of the conspiracy ! Could Dymnus then fail to mention the one whose follower he was, especially when I ought to have been named, even falsely, to Nicomachus, who asked^c who were his associates, in order that the man who was being 7 tempted might be more easily persuaded ? For when the crime was disclosed, he did not leave out my name in order that he might seem to have spared an associate; for when he confessed to Nicomachus, who he believed would keep in silence the secrets about himself, having named others, me alone he left out. Pray, fellow-soldiers, if Cebalinus had not come to me, if he had wished me to know nothing about the conspirators, would I to-day be pleading my cause, when no one named me? Suppose that Dymnus were still alive and wished to spare me, what of the rest? Those who will confess their own guilt will of course be silent about me! Calamity is malign, and as a rule a guilty person, when suffering his own torture, assents to that of another. Will so many accomplices not confess the truth even when placed upon the rack? And yet no one spares one who is about to die, and in my opinion one who is about to die spares no one.

“I must return to the real and only accusation against me: ‘Why did you keep silence about the matter which was reported to you? why did you hear it with so little concern?’ This, such as it is, you, Alexander, wherever you are, pardoned when I confessed it; grasping your right hand, as a pledge of restored friendship, I even was present at your banquet. If you believed me, I was acquitted, if you spared me, I was dismissed; pray abide by your decision. What have I done during this last night, when I left your table? what new crime has been reported to you and changed your mind? I was resting in heavy sleep, when, as I had fallen asleep over my misfortunes, my enemies awakened me by binding me. Whence did such deep sleep come to a traitor and one who had been betrayed? plished. But to me, first my blamelessness, then your right hand, had brought freedom from care ; I had no fear that more would be allowed to the cruelty 15 of others than to your clemency. But to prevent you from regretting your belief in me, let me say that the matter was reported to me by a mere boy, who could show me no witness nor proof of his information, and who would fill all with fear if he should begin to be 16 heard. Unhappily I believed that my ears had been exposed to a quarrel of a wanton and his boy, and besides I suspected his truthfulness because he did not himself bring the report, but employed his 17 brother instead. I feared lest he should deny having given instructions to Cebalinus, and I should seem to have been the cause of danger to many of the king's 18 friends. Even as it is, although I have injured no one, I have found one who preferred that I should perish rather than be unharmed ; what enmities do you think I should have incurred, if I had attacked blameless 19 persons ? But, you will say, Dymnus killed himself ! Could I have divined that he would do so ? Certainly not. Hence the only thing which has given assurance to this information could not influence me when I was 20 accosted by Cebalinus. But, by Heaven, if I had been an accomplice with Dymnus in so great a crime, I ought not to have concealed for those two days my knowledge that we had been betrayed ; Cebalinus himself could have been put out of the 21 way, and with no trouble. Finally, after the information which I was going to conceal had been made known, I entered the king's bedroom alone, and wearing a sword. Why did I put off the deed ? Was

- 23 “ It is even charged against me that I scorn association with my native language, that I disdain the customs of the Macedonians. So then I aspire to the rule of something which I hold in contempt. It is long ago that that native tongue has gone out of use through intercourse with other nations ; a foreign language has to be learned as well by the victors as by 24 the vanquished. Those charges, by Heaven ! are no more injurious to me than it is that Amyntas, son of Perdiccas, plotted against the king. The charge that I was on friendly terms with him I do not refuse to meet, provided it was our duty not to love the king’s 25 brother.^a But if it was necessary even to venerate one in that lofty position, am I, pray, guilty because I did not have the power of divination, or must the innocent friends of guilty men also die ? But if that is just, why have I lived so long ? if unjust, why am 26 I nevertheless to die now ? But, it may be said, I also wrote that I pitied those who had to live under a man who believed himself the son of Jupiter. O loyalty to friendship, O dangerous freedom in giving true counsel, it is you that played me false ! It was you that impelled me not to keep silent about 27 what I thought. I confess that I wrote this to the king, but not about the king.^b For I did not seek to rouse ill-will against him, but I feared for him. It seemed to me more worthy of Alexander to recognize in silence the parentage of Jupiter, than 28 to boast of it publicly. But since the truth of the oracle is sure, let the god bear witness in my case ;

XI. There was among the generals one Bolon, valiant in deeds of arms, but unacquainted with the arts of peace and with civil manners, an old soldier, who had risen from a humble rank to the position 2 which he then held ; he, when the rest were silent, rudely and with coarse audacity began to remind them how often they had been put out of the quarters which they had occupied in order that the off-scourings of Philotas’ slaves might be received in the places from which they had driven out his fellow-3 soldiers. That his wagons laden with gold and silver had stood in whole sections of the city, and that not one of his fellow-soldiers was admitted even to the neighbourhood of his lodging, but they were all removed to a distance by those whom he had placed in their positions to watch over his sleep, lest that she-man^a might be disturbed by what is more truly described as the silence than the sound of those who

5 Now he wished Hammon to be consulted ; but that same man accused Jupiter of lying when he acknowledged Alexander as his son, fearing, forsooth, lest what the gods offered should be an object of envy !
6 When he was plotting against the life of his king and his friend, he did not consult Jupiter ; now he would send to the oracle, in order that in the meantime his father may arouse those whom he governs in Media, and with the money entrusted to his charge may 7 induce abandoned men to share in his crime. They themselves would send to the oracle, not to ask Jupiter what they had learned from the king, but to thank him, and pay the vows which they had made for the safety of the best of kings.
8 Then truly the whole assembly was inflamed, and a beginning was made by the body-guards, who shouted that the traitor ought to be torn to pieces by their own hands. This indeed Philotas, who feared severer tortures, heard by no means reluctantly ;
9 but the king, having returned to the assembly, either that he might also ^a torture him in prison, or that he might investigate the whole matter more carefully, adjourned the council to the following day, and although the time was approaching evening, he nevertheless ordered his friends to be called together.
10 And therest for their part recommended that Philotas be stoned to death, according to the ancient custom of the Macedonians, but Hephaestion and Craterus and Coenus said ^b that the truth ought to be forced from him by torments ; and those also who had recommended the other course went over to their 11 opinion. Therefore the council was dismissed, and Hephaestion with Craterus and Coenus arose to put 12 Philotas to the question. The king, having summoned Craterus and had a talk with him, the subject of which has not been made public, withdrew into the inner part of his quarters, and dismissing all witnesses awaited until late at night the result of the inquisition.

13 The torturers laid out all their instruments of 14 cruelty before the eyes of Philotas. And he, of his own accord, said : " Why do you delay to kill the king's enemy, the murderer who confesses that he wished to kill him ? What is the need of an inquisition ? I planned it, I wished it." Craterus demanded that what he confessed he should also say under torture.
 15 Then he was seized, and while his eyes were being bound, while his clothing was being taken off, he called upon his country's gods and on the law of nations,^a but vainly to deaf ears. Then he was torn by the utmost torments, inasmuch as he had been condemned and his personal enemies were torturing 16 him to gratify the king. And at first, although now fire, and now the lash was used upon him, no longer for the purpose of seeking the truth, but as a punishment, he kept not only words but even groans under 17 control ; but when his body, swollen with wounds, could no longer endure the blows of the scourges upon his bare bones, he promised that if they would moderate his tortures, he would tell them what they 18 wished to know. But he wished them to swear by Alexander's life that there would be an end to the torments, and the torturers removed. And when

- both things were granted, he said : " Tell me, Craterus, what you wish me to say." And when Craterus was indignant that Philotas was mocking him, and was calling the torturers back again, Philotas began to ask for time until he could recover his breath, after which he would tell everything which he knew.
- 20 Meanwhile the cavalry, all those of the noblest birth and especially such as were nearly related to Parmenion, after the report had spread abroad that Philotas was being tortured, fearing the law of the Macedonians by which it was provided that the relatives of those who had plotted against the king should be put to death with the guilty parties, some killed themselves, others fled to out-of-the-way mountains and to lonely desert places, while great terror spread through the entire camp, until the king, learning of the tumult, made proclamation ^a that he remitted the law providing for the punishment of those related to the guilty parties.

- have fallen under a tyranny endurable neither to the gods, to whom he makes himself equal, nor to men, 25 from whom he separates himself. Have we at the price of our blood created a god who disdains us, who is reluctant to enter into council with mortals? Believe me, we too, if we are men, shall be adopted by 26 the gods. Who avenged the death of Alexander,^a the ancestor of this one, who afterwards that of Archelaüs,^b who of Perdiccas? ^c He himself pardoned the murderers of his father.' ^d
- 27 "These were the words of Hegelochus at dinner ^e; and on the dawn of the following day I was summoned by my father. He was troubled and saw that I was sad; for we had heard what struck anxiety 28 into our hearts. Therefore, in order to learn whether Hegelochus had blurted out those words when heavy with wine, or whether they were inspired by some loftier design, we decided to have him summoned. He came, and after repeating the same sentiments of his own accord, he added that if we dared to take the lead, he would claim from us the honour of seconding our plan, or if we lacked the courage, he would bury 29 the plan in silence. To Parmenion the plan seemed premature while Darius still lived: for they would be killing Alexander, not for themselves, but for the enemy; but if Darius were out of the way, as a reward for killing the king Asia and the entire Orient would fall to his slayers. This advice was approved, and a pledge to that end was given and received. 30 So far as Dymnus is concerned, I know nothing, but I know that after this confession it does not avail me that I have no part in the present crime."

- 31 They again applied tortures, and striking at his face and eyes with their own spears as well, they forced him to plead guilty to that crime also.
- 32 Then, when they required him to set forth the order of the proposed deed, he replied that since it seemed that Bactra would detain the king for a long time, they feared that his father,^a being seventy years old, the leader of so great an army and custodian of so great a treasure, might meanwhile die, and that he himself, robbed of so great strength, would have 38 and he himself had planned that crime. Therefore all who had been named by Nicomachus were stoned to death on a given signal, after the usage of their country.

39 Alexander had been freed from great danger, not indeed of death, but of hatred; for Parmenion and Philotas, the chief men among his friends, unless clearly shown to be guilty, could not have been condemned without exciting the indignation of the 40 whole army. Thus the issue of the case was doubtful as long as he denied the crime; that his torture was continued after the confession was considered an act of cruelty; and now Philotas merited the compassion of his friends.^a which is one of the chief sources of later biographers. So also Diodorus (xvii. 80) and Plutarch (Alex. xlviii.-xlix.). But Justin (xii. 5) condemns the king. BOOK VII

CONTENTS OF BOOK VII

The recent conspiracy leads Alexander to take up the case of Alexander Lyncestes, who had been in prison for three years. He is called upon to make a defence, and, failing to do so successfully, is put to death. The brothers Amyntas and Simias, friends of Philotas, are accused, but are defended by Amyntas (i).

Amyntas and his brother are restored to favour. Their younger brother, Polemon, who had fled when Philotas was tortured, is pardoned by Alexander. Polydamas is summoned and sent in haste to Media, where he brings about the death of Parmenion. Alexander separates from the rest of the army those soldiers who complained for various reasons (ii).

Alexander after subduing the Arimaspi and the Arachosii crosses Mount Parapanisus with his army and founds at its foot a city of Alexandria (iii).

Bessus at a banquet consults about war against Alexander. Gobares advises against it, but without effect. Bessus is deserted and flees to the Sogdiani. The single combat of Satibarzanes and Erigyius. Alexander arrives at Bactra and hears of the death of Satibarzanes (iv).

Alexander crosses the Oxus. Bessus is betrayed by Spitamenes and brought to Alexander; the king delivers him to Oxathres, brother of Darius, to be crucified (v).

Sogdiana is subdued but revolts again; Cyropolis and other cities are taken. A city of Alexandria is founded on the Iaxartes (vi).

about war with the Scythians. Aristander interprets the omens in accordance with the wishes of Alexander. Menedemus is defeated and slain with a loss of 2500 horsemen. Alexander conceals the disaster (vii).

While Alexander is preparing for war, envoys arrive from the Scythians and deliver an address proposing peace (viii).

Alexander, having dismissed the envoys, crosses the Iaxartes and attacks the Scythians. Having defeated them, he treats them generously. He receives the Sacae in surrender and then pursues Spitamenes, who had defeated Menedemus (ix).

Sogdiana is recovered ; the high spirit of its nobles. Alexander returns to Bactra. Bessus is sent to Ecbatana to suffer punishment. Six cities are founded near Margiana (x).

The crag of Arimaza, almost impregnable from its situation and from the nature of the country, is captured by Alexander. Because of his obstinate defence its commander, Ariamazes, along with his relatives and other nobles, is scourged and crucified (xi).

BOOK VII

I. ALTHOUGH while the traces of his crime were fresh, the soldiers believed that Philotas had been justly punished, yet after the man whom they hated had 2 ceased to live, hatred changed to pity. The distinction of the young Philotas affected them, and the 3 old age and bereavement of his father. Parmenion had been the first to open Asia to the king,^a and as his partner in all dangers had had charge ^b of one wing of the army in battle; he had also been first of Philip's friends,^c and was so faithful to Alexander himself that Alexander preferred to use no other 4 emissary in killing Attalus. The thought of these things occurred to the army, and mutinous words were reported to the king. He, being not greatly disturbed by these, and well aware that the faults of idleness are dispelled ^d by activity, made proclamation for all to appear at the entrance of his head-5 quarters.^e When he learned that they were present there in great numbers, he entered the assembly.

Atarrhias, undoubtedly by previous arrangement, began by asking that Lyncestes Alexander, who long before Philotas had wished to kill the king, should be 6 brought before them. He had been charged with this by two informers, as we have said above,^f and

- was now spending the third year of his imprisonment in fetters. It was regarded as certain that he had also, with Pausanias, conspired to kill Philip, but because he had been the first to hail Alexander as king, he was exempted from punishment rather than 7 from guilt; then too the prayers of his father-in-law Antipater were delaying the king's just anger. However, the resentment, which had been coming to a head broke out anew, since anxiety from the present danger revived the memory of the one of long stand-8 ing. Therefore Alexander (Lyncestes) was brought out of prison, and when ordered to speak, although for three whole years he had practised a defence, yet hesitating and trembling he presented only a few words of what he had composed, and finally, not 9 only his memory, but his thoughts failed him. No one doubted that his alarm was an indication of a guilty conscience and not of a failure of memory. Accordingly, some of those who stood nearest to him ran him through with their lances as he was still struggling with forgetfulness.
- 10 When his body had been taken away, the king ordered Amyntas and Simias ^a to be brought in, for Polemon, the youngest of the brothers, had fled when he heard that Philotas was being tortured.
- 11 These had been the dearest of all Philotas' friends, and had been advanced to important and honourable positions mainly through his influence, and the king remembered that Philotas had recommended them to him with the greatest urgency, and did not doubt that they had been participants also in this last design 12 of his. Therefore he complained that they had long since been objects of his suspicion because of letters of his mother, in which he had been warned to protect his life against them ; but that although he had been unwilling to believe unfavourable reports, now forced by clear proofs, he had ordered them to be imprisoned. For it could not be doubted that the day before the crime of Philotas was revealed they had been with him in secret. Moreover, their brother who had run away during the inquisition of Philotas had made clear the reason for his flight. Lately, under the pretence of rendering service, they had removed all other persons to a distance, and contrary to custom had attached themselves to his side without any plausible reason, and because he was surprised that they performed such service out of their turn,^a and alarmed by their very confusion, he had quickly taken refuge with his guards who were following close after him.

It was added to this, that when Antiphanes, commissary of the cavalry,^b had given orders to Amyntas, the day before the crime of Philotas had been discovered, that, as was usual, he should turn over some of his horses to those who had lost theirs, Amyntas had replied insolently, that unless Antiphanes gave up his attempt, he would soon know who Amyntas was. That now his violent tongue and the rash words that were hurled at the king himself were nothing other than an indication of, and testimony to, an evil design. If these charges were true, those men deserved the same treatment as Philotas, if false, he himself demanded that they should refute them. Then Antiphanes, being brought forward, gave testimony about the failure to deliver the horses and also that Amyntas had arrogantly added threats. Then Amyntas, on being given permission to speak, said :
 " If it makes no difference to the king, I ask that, while I am speaking I may be freed from fetters." The king ordered both to be released, and when Amyntas desired that the apparel of a guard also be restored to him, he ordered that a lance be given him.

- 19 When he took this in his left hand, shunning the place in which the body of Alexander Lyncestes had lain a short time before, Amyntas said : " Whatever outcome awaits us, Sire, we confess that if it is favourable, we shall owe it to you ; that if it is less so, we shall attribute it to ill-fortune. We plead our cause without prejudice,^a bodies and minds both free ; you have also even restored the apparel in which we are accustomed to attend you. We cannot distrust our cause, we shall cease to fear ill-fortune.

But even if some harsher speech had been heard from a soldier of yours, either when wearied and worn out on the march or encountering danger in battle, or in his tent when ailing and attending to his wounds, we have deserved by brave deeds that you should prefer to impute it to our exigency rather than to ill-will.

loyalty, we were, forsooth, to be unfriendly to one 30 whom you preferred to all others ! Therefore, if this is a crime, you have few who are blameless, nay, by Heaven, not one. For all wished to be friends of Philotas, but not all those who wished to be could be. So, if you do not distinguish his friends from the guilty, you will not separate, either, from his friends those who have wished to be such.

31 “ What evidence of guilty knowledge, then, is brought against us ? I suppose it is because the Therefore it follows that, because it is for that reason that she is angry with us, you should soothe your mother, since it is you who have exposed us to her anger."

II. While Amyntas was making this plea, those chanced to arrive who had pursued his brother Polemon, of whom mention has been made before,^b and whom, being in flight, they were bringing back in bonds. The incensed assembly could hardly be restrained from at once stoning him to death, according to their custom. But he, quite unterrified, said :
 2 " I ask no mercy for myself, provided my flight be not prejudicial to the innocence of my brothers.^c If this cannot be defended, let the guilt be mine. Their cause is the better for the very reason that I was 3 suspected because I took flight." But when he had said this, the whole assembly sympathized ; now they all began to shed tears, and were suddenly so changed to the opposite opinion that what had especially damaged his cause was the only thing that was 4 in his favour. He was a young man just come to maturity and in the first bloom of his youth, one of the horsemen who had been terrified by the torture of Philotas and whom the alarm of others had led to flee ; deserted by his companions, and wavering between the purpose of returning and of fleeing, he was overtaken by those who had followed him.

uses the tradition which he follows to make a very vivid picture, in much fuller detail than Arrian.

^c That is, if his flight will not be interpreted as evidence of the guilt of his brothers, who also fled.

- 5 He then began to weep and to beat his face, not grieving on his own account,^a but on that of his brothers, who were endangered through him.
- 6 And now he had affected the king also, and not only the assembly, but his brother alone was inexorable, and gazing at him with a terrifying expression, exclaimed : " Then, madman, is when you ought to have wept, when you were applying spurs to your horse, a deserter of your brothers and a companion of deserters. Wretch, whither were you fleeing and from whom ? You have forced me, on trial for my

Then truly the soldiers did not moderate their tears and the acclamations ^b by which a crowd expresses its favour. One cry was uttered by common consent, that the king should pardon these brave and blameless men. His friends also, when opportunity for mercy had been to have an expression presenting the appearance of joy, he ran to embrace him, and after they had exchanged greetings, Polydamas handed him the letter

 27 Afterwards he was reading the second letter, written in the name of Philotas, with pleasure, as could be seen from his expression; then Cleander plunged his sword into his side and struck him again in the throat, and the others stabbed him even after he was lifeless.
 28 And the guards, who were posted at the entrance of the grove, on learning of the murder, the cause of which was unknown to them, came into the camp and aroused the soldiers with the alarming message.
 29 They armed themselves and went in a body to the grove in which the murder had been committed, threatening that unless Polydamas and the rest who had shared in the same outrage ^c were delivered to them, they would throw down the wall surrounding the grove and offer expiation for the death of their 30 leader with the blood of all. Cleander ordered their leaders to be admitted, and read to the soldiers the letters which the king had written, in which were contained an account of the plots of Parmenion against the king and Alexander's prayers that they

^a The sketch of Parmenion's life is only general; the interest of later historians in Alexander, and the effort to exalt his exploits, made it difficult to give a fuller characterization; cf. Arr. iii. 26. 4.

^b An unjustified statement; Curtius is more rhetorical than historically accurate.

^c Cf. Arr. iii. 26. 4.

When many of them had slipped away, a few remained, who prayed that at least they might be permitted by them to bury the body. This was for a long time refused through Cleander's fear that he might thus offend the king. Then, when they besought more persistently, thinking that occasion for disturbance ought to be removed, Cleander cut off the head and allowed them to bury the body; the head was sent to the king.

33 Such was the end of Parmenion,^a a man illustrious in war and in peace. He had achieved many successes without the king, the king had done no great deed without him.^b He satisfied a king who was most fortunate and who required that all things should match the greatness of his good fortune. At the age of seventy he fulfilled the duties of a leader in the prime of life and often even those of a common soldier; keen in counsel, vigorous in action, he was dear to the leading men and still more so to the common soldiers.

34 Whether these qualities^c drove him to a desire for royal power, or merely made him suspected of such a design, may be doubted; for it was uncertain, even when the affair was recent and could more easily be made clear, whether Philotas, overcome by the violence of his tortures, told the truth about matters which could not be proved, or by a false confession sought an end to his torments.

35 Alexander, thinking^d that those who, as he had learned, had freely deplored the death of Parmenion ought to be separated from the rest of the army, put them apart in one cohort and gave them as their leader Leonidas,^e who had himself formerly

- 36 been an intimate friend of Parmenion. These were about the same as those whom he had for other reasons disliked. For once, when he wished to sound the feelings of the soldiers, he told them that if any had written letters to their people in Macedonia, he would hand them to the messengers whom he himself was sending, who would faithfully deliver them. Each man had written frankly to his relatives what he had thought; to some military service was burdensome, to most it was not disagreeable. In this way Alexander got hold of the letters of those who had written favourably and of those who complained.
- 37 And he ordered a cohort of those who chanced in their letters to have complained of the irksome military service to encamp apart from the rest by way of disgrace, saying that he would use their bravery in war, but would remove loose talking from credulous ears. This plan, perhaps rash—for the bravest of men had been irritated by the insult—like everything else, the
- 38 good fortune of the king made successful. Nothing was more enthusiastic for war than those men; their valour was enhanced both from the desire of wiping out disgrace, and because brave deeds could not be concealed among a few.

III. When these matters had been thus arranged, Alexander, having made Arsames satrap of the Drangae, ordered a march to be proclaimed against the Arimaspi, whom even at that time they called the Euergetae,^a having changed their name from the time when they had aided with shelter and supplies the army of Cyrus, when it was almost worn out by

He himself set in order^c the race of the Euergetae within sixty days,^d and gave them a great sum of money because of their splendid loyalty to Cyrus.

4 Then, after having left Amedines to govern them—he had been Darius' secretary—he subdued the Arachosii, whose territory extends to the Pontic Sea.^e There he met the army which had been commanded by Parmenion. It consisted of 6000 Macedonians, 200 nobles, 5000 Greeks, with 600 cavalry, beyond 5 doubt the flower of all the king's forces.^f Menon was made governor of the Arachosii, and 4000 infantry and 600 cavalry were left as a garrison.

The king himself with his army entered a nation not very well known even to their neighbours, since, having no commerce with them, they practised no 6 borrowed customs. They are called the Parapanisadae,^g a rude race of men and especially uncultivated even among barbarians. The harshness of their climate had hardened the nature also of the inhabit- 7 ants. They look in great part toward the very cold northern pole,^h on the west they are adjacent to the ^e This, the Black Sea, is of course absurd. Warmington suggests that, by an error, Ponticum may have arisen from πόντος, = mare or perhaps ῥέανός; hence "to the Red Sea," or "to the Indian Ocean." The Arachosii were in eastern Iran or Baluchistan.

Bactriani, on the south their territory slopes toward 8 the Indian sea. They build huts of unbaked brick, and because the land is destitute of timber, since even the ridge of the mountain is bare, they use the same 9 brick up to the very top of their buildings. But their structure is broader at the base and gradually becomes narrower as the work grows, and finally it comes together very much like the keel of a ship.^a There they leave an opening and let in light from 10 above. Vines and trees, if any have been able to live in such a rigorous climate, they bury deep in the ground; in winter these remain dug in, and when the end of winter begins to open the earth, they are 11 restored to the sky and to the sun. But such deep snows cover the ground and are bound so fast by ice and almost perpetual cold, that no trace is to be found even of birds or of any wild beast. What may be called a dim shadow of the sky rather than light, and resembling night, broods over the earth, so that objects which are near at hand can hardly be made 12 out. The army, then, abandoned in this absence of all human civilization, endured all the evils that could 13 be suffered, want, cold, fatigue, despair. The unusual cold of the snow caused the death of many, to many it brought frost-bite of the feet, to very many blindness of the eyes. It was especially harmful to those who were fatigued; for when their strength gave out, they stretched themselves on the very ice, and when they ceased to move, the force of the cold so bound them fast, that when they struggled to rise again, they could 14 not do so. But they were roused from their torpor by their fellow-soldiers, for there was no other cure than to be forced to go on; then only, when their

- 15 If any could reach the huts of the barbarians, they were quickly restored. But such was the darkness that the only thing which revealed the buildings was 16 their smoke. When the natives, who had never before seen a stranger in their country, suddenly caught sight of armed men, they were paralysed with fear and brought them whatever they had in their 17 huts, begging them to spare their lives. The king went about on foot among his troops, lifting up some who were lying prostrate, and, by the aid of his body, supporting those who were following with difficulty. Now in the van, now in the centre, now at the rear of the army he was everywhere present with manifold 18 toil. At length they came to more cultivated places and the army was revived by an abundance of supplies; at the same time also those who had not been able to keep up came into the camp which they had pitched.
- 19 From there the army proceeded to the Caucasus mountains,^a whose range divides Asia by a continuous ridge. It looks on one side to the sea which washes Cilicia, on the other to the Caspian Sea, the river Araxes, and the well-known deserts of the Scythian 20 region. Taurus, a mountain of second rank in height, joins the Caucasus; rising from Cappadocia, it passes by Cilicia, and unites itself with the Armenian moun-21 tains. Thus the ranges, as if connected in a series, form a continuous chain, from which almost all the rivers of Asia flow, some into the Red Sea,^b others stretching from the Mediterranean to the "eastern Ocean," and the whole ridge was often called Taurus.

 22 in a space of seventeen days. There is a crag in the mountain, embracing ten stadia in circumference and rising to four stadia in height, on which ancient 23 fable reports that Prometheus was chained. A site for founding a city was chosen at the foot of the mountain and seven thousand from the subdued nations were permitted to settle in the new city, as well as those soldiers whose services the king had ceased to make use of. This city also its inhabitants called Alexandria.

IV. But Bessus, greatly terrified by Alexander's speed, after having duly performed a sacrifice to the gods of the country, as is the custom with those nations, was feasting and holding council with his friends and with the leaders of his forces about the 2 war. Heavy with wine, they began to boast of their strength, and to express scorn, now of the rashness
 3 of the enemy, now of their small numbers. In particular Bessus, in insolent language and so proud of a sovereignty gained by murder as hardly to be in his right mind, began by saying that the reputation of the enemy had increased through the incapacity 4 of Darius. For he had encountered them in the narrowest part of the passes of Cilicia, when by drawing back he might have taken them off their guard and led them into places which the nature of the country made safe, since so many rivers lay in the way and there were so many hiding-places in the mountains that if surprised among these the enemy would have had not even an opportunity for flight, 5 much less for resisting. That it was his intention to withdraw into the land of the Sogdiani; he would

10 been holding in his hand.^e Having taken the cup, Gobares said: “The nature of mortal men may be called perverse and vicious under this head also, that each one is less keen-sighted in his own business than 12 whatever you yourself have devised. You sustain a great burden on your head, a kingly crown; this must either be borne with moderation or, which I pray the gods to avert, it will fall in ruins upon you. There is need of prudence, not of impetuosity."

- 13 Then he added a proverb in common use among the Bactriani, that a timid dog barks more violently than it bites, and that the deepest rivers flow with the least sound. This I have quoted, in order that whatever wisdom could exist among barbarians^a might be recorded.
- 14 By these words Gobares had left in suspense the expectation of his hearers^b; then he disclosed his advice, which was more expedient for Bessus than pleasing to him. "At the entrance^c of your kingdom," said he, "stands the swiftest of kings; he will advance his army before you put away that table of yours.
- 15 Now you will summon an army from the Tanais, and you will oppose rivers to his arms. Of course the enemy cannot follow to whatever place you shall flee! The route is common to both, safer for the victor. Although you may think that fear is swift, yet hope 16 is more rapid. Why do you not hasten to gain the favour of the stronger and give yourself up, since however it may turn out, you will have better fortune in having surrendered than you will have as his 17 enemy? You are holding the kingdom of another, hence it will be easier to do without it. You would perhaps begin to be a legitimate king when he himself has made you one who can give you royal power, or still more so by much wine, so burned with anger that he was with difficulty restrained by his friends from killing the speaker—for he had even drawn his scimitar. At any rate, he leaped up from the banquet-table, quite beside himself. Gobares escaped amid the confusion and deserted to Alexander.

- 20 Bessus had 8000 ^a Bactriani under arms. These, so long as they believed that the Macedonians because of the rigour of the climate would be more likely to go to India, carried out his orders obediently; after they learned that Alexander was coming against them, they slipped away each to his own village and 21 deserted Bessus. He with a band of his clients who had not changed their allegiance passed over the river Oxus, and after burning the boats in which he had crossed, in order that the enemy might not use them, was levying fresh forces among the Sogdiani.
- 22 Alexander had crossed the Caucasus, ^b as was said above, but had almost been reduced to starvation 23 through lack of grain. With the juice pressed from sesame they anointed their bodies in lieu of oil, but each amphora of this juice was valued at 240 denarii, an amphora of honey at 390, and of wine at 300; of 24 wheat very little or nothing was found. For the barbarians had pits which they call siri, ^c which they conceal so skilfully, that only those who dug them can find them; in these their crops were stored away.
 In lack of these supplies the soldiers lived on fish from kill the pack-animals which carried their baggage ; on the flesh of these they managed to exist until they reached the Bactriani.

- 26 The land of the Bactriani is of a manifold and varied nature. In one part many trees and vines produce plentiful and mellow fruits, frequent brooks irrigate the rich soil, the milder parts ^a of this they sow with grain, the rest they leave for pasture for the flocks.
- 27 Farther on a great part of the same land is occupied by sterile sands ; because of its frightful ^b dryness the region is uninhabited and produces no fruit. Indeed, when the winds blow from the Pontic sea, ^c they sweep together whatever sand lies on the plains ; when this is piled up, it looks from a distance like great hills, and all traces of the former road disappear.
- 28 Accordingly, those who cross the plains watch the stars and direct their course by them, as do those who sail the sea ; and the shade of night is almost brighter
- 29 than daylight. Therefore the region is impassable in the daytime, because they find no traces to follow, and the light of the stars is hidden in darkness. Moreover, if the wind which arises from the sea overtakes
- 30 any, it buries them in the sand. But where the land is milder it breeds a great multitude of men and horses. Therefore the cavalry of the Bactriani had
- 31 amounted to 30,000. Bactra ^d itself, the capital of the region, is situated at the foot of Mount Parapanisus. The Bactrus River ^e flows at the foot of its walls. The river gave its name to the city and to the region.

there,^a news came from Greece of the revolt of the Peloponnesians and the Laconians—for they had not yet been vanquished when those who were to report the beginnings of that uprising set forth—and another cause of alarm near at hand was reported, namely, that the Scythians who dwell beyond the river Tanais were coming and bringing aid to Bessus. At the same time news was brought of what Caranus and Erigyius 33 had accomplished in the land of the Arii. A battle had been fought between the Macedonians and the Arii. The traitor Satibarzanes commanded the barbarians; when he saw that the battle was almost at a standstill with the forces equal on both sides, he rode into the foremost ranks, and taking off his helmet and checking those who were hurling weapons, he challenged to battle anyone who wished to fight in single combat^b; he said that he would fight bare-34 headed. Erigyius, advanced in years, it is true, but in vigour of both mind and body not to be deemed inferior to any of the young men, could not endure the bravado of the barbarian. He, having taken off his helmet and displaying his white hair, said: “The time has come for me to show either by victory or by a glorious death what sort of friends and soldiers 35 Alexander has.” Without more words he drove his horse against the foe.

You would believe that the order had been given for both^c armies to cease fighting; certain it is that they at once drew back and left a free space, intent upon the fate, not only of the leaders, but their own also, since they were bound to share the outcome of 36 another's fight.^d The barbarian was the first to hurl his spear. Erigyius avoided it by a slight movement

 37 The barbarian, though thrown from his horse, yet still continued to fight. But Erigyus, drawing the spear from the wound, directed it again at his face. Sati-barzanes seized it with his hand, in order to die more 38 quickly, and aided the enemy's stroke. The barbarians, having lost their leader, whom they had followed rather on compulsion than voluntarily, and then not unmindful of the merits of Alexander,

A few, advised by those who knew the region, had provided themselves with water beforehand ; this for a time appeased their thirst, then, as the heat increased, the desire for water was kindled again. Therefore what wine and oil there was was lavished upon all, and so great was the pleasure of drinking, that they

- 13 At length Alexander came to the river Oxus at about sunset. But the great part of the army had been unable to keep up with him; hence he ordered fires to be lighted on a high hill, in order that those 14 who were following with difficulty might know that they were not far from the camp, but that of those who were in the front of the army, after speedily refreshing themselves with food and drink, some should fill skins, others whatever other vessels could 15 hold water, and bring aid to his men. But those who had drunk too intemperately, had a choking fit^b and died, and the number of these was much greater 16 than the king had lost in any battle. But he, still wearing his cuirass and refreshed neither with food nor drink, stood on the road by which the army was coming, nor did he retire to refresh himself until the whole army had passed by, and he spent that whole 17 night without sleep in great trouble of mind. Nor was he more cheerful on the following day, because he had no boats, nor could a bridge be set up, since all the land around the river was bare and especially lacking in timber. Therefore he adopted the only 18 expedient that necessity had suggested; he distributed as many skins stuffed with straw as possible;

lying upon these, they swam^a across the river, and those who had crossed first remained on guard until the rest had passed over. In this way he brought his whole army on the farther bank after five days.

- 19 And now he had decided to go on in pursuit of Bessus, when he learned what had happened in the country of the Sogdiani. Spitamenes was most 20 highly honoured by Bessus among all his friends, but treachery cannot be tamed by any services, a thing which nevertheless might have been less odious in his case, since it seemed that no wrong could be done by anyone to Bessus, the murderer of his king. A specious pretext for his crime was offered, namely, the avenging of Darius, but it was the fortune, not the evil 21 deed, of Bessus that he hated. For when he learned that Alexander had crossed the river Oxus, he enrolled Dataphernes and Catanes, in whom Bessus had the greatest confidence, as accomplices in the conspiracy which he had planned. They consented more promptly than they were asked, and taking with them eight very strong young men, they laid the 22 following snare. Spitamenes went to Bessus and in a private conference said that he had learned that Dataphernes and Catanes were plotting against him, in order to deliver him alive to Alexander; that he had anticipated their conspiracy and was holding them in fetters.
- 23 Bessus, under obligation for this great service, as he thought it, both thanked them and, eager to inflict punishment, ordered the two men to be brought 24 to him. They, with their arms voluntarily bound, were dragged in by the accomplices in the plot; Bessus, gazing fiercely at them, arose, evidently unable to refrain from laying hands upon them. Then they, laying aside pretence, surrounded him, and in spite of his vain attempts at resistance bound him, tearing from his head the royal tiara and rending the clothes which he had put on from the spoils of the murdered 25 king. Bessus, confessing that the gods had come as avengers of his crime, added that they had not been unfavourable to Darius, whom they thus avenged, but propitious to Alexander, since even his enemies 26 always aided his victory. Whether the populace would have rescued Bessus is uncertain, had not those who had bound him, by falsely saying that they had done so by order of Alexander,^a terrified them while their minds were still wavering. The conspirators placed him on a horse and took him to be delivered to Alexander.^b

^a According to Ptolemy in Arr. iii. 30. 1-2, Spitamenes and Dataphernes lost their courage, and Bessus fell into the hands of those whom Alexander had sent.

27 Meanwhile ^c the king, having selected about 900 of those whose discharge was due, gave two talents to each of the cavalry and to each of the infantry 3000 denarii, and sent them home after exhorting them to beget children. To the rest he gave thanks, because they promised to render good service for the remainder of the war.

28 While the king was pursuing Bessus, they arrived at a little town. It was inhabited by the Branchidae ^d; they had in former days migrated from Miletus by order of Xerxes, when he was returning from Greece, and had settled in that place, because to gratify

Xerxes they had violated the temple^a which is 29 called the Didymœon. They had not ceased to follow the customs of their native land, but they were already bilingual, having gradually degenerated from their original language through the influence of a foreign tongue. Therefore they received Alexander with great joy and surrendered their city and themselves. He ordered the Milesians who were serving 30 with him to be called together. They cherished a hatred of long standing against the race of the Branchidae. Therefore the king allowed to those who had been betrayed free discretion as to the Branchidae, whether they preferred to remember 31 the injury or their common origin. Then, since their opinions varied, he made known to them that he himself would consider what was best to be done.

On the following day when the Branchidae met him, he ordered them to come along with him, and when they had reached the city, he himself entered 32 the gate with a light-armed company; the phalanx he ordered to surround the walls of the town and at a given signal to pillage the city, which was a haunt of traitors, and to kill the inhabitants to a man.
 33 The unarmed wretches were butchered everywhere, and the cruelty could not be checked either by community of language or by the draped olive branches^b and prayers of the suppliants. At last, in order that the walls might be thrown down, their foundations were undermined, so that no vestige of the city might 34 survive. As for their woods also and their sacred groves, they not only cut them down, but even pulled out the stumps, to the end that, since even the roots were burned out, nothing but a desert waste 35 and sterile ground might be left. If this had been designed against the actual authors of the treason, it would seem to have been a just vengeance and not cruelty ; as it was, their descendants ^a expiated the guilt of their forefathers, although they themselves had never seen Miletus, and so could not have betrayed it to Xerxes.

- 36 Then Alexander advanced to the river Tanais.^b Thither Bessus was brought, not only bound, but stripped of all his clothing. Spitamenes held him with a chain ^c placed about his neck, a sight as pleasing to the barbarians as to the Macedonians. Then Spitamenes said : " Avenging both you and Darius, my kings, I have brought you the slayer of his lord, captured in the manner of which he himself set the example. Would that Darius might open his eyes to behold the spectacle. Would that he might rise from the lower world, since he did not deserve such a

But the reward for this parricide you have
- 39 paid yourself by the false name of king." Bessus, not daring to deny his crime, said that he had used the title of king in order that he might be able to hand over his nation to him ; for if he had delayed, another would have seized the rule.

 not be kept off by anyone else than Catanes, desiring to show the man's remarkable skill ; for he struck his is frequent, such skill may seem less wonderful, but at that time it was a great wonder to those who saw it 43 and gained Catanes great repute. Gifts were given to all who had brought in Bessus. But Alexander postponed his execution, in order that he might be slain in that very place where he had killed Darius.

VI. Meanwhile some of the Macedonians, who had gone forth in a disorderly band to forage, were fallen upon by the barbarians, who rushed down from the mountains near by, and more were captured than 2 were killed ; but the barbarians, driving their prisoners before them, withdrew again to the moun-

- the Macedonians had not been more sorrowful than they themselves on hearing of the wound ; that if they could have discovered who had inflicted it, they would have given him up ; for that only the impious
- 7 warred with the gods. Furthermore, they said, that overcome by his wound, they surrendered their race into his protection. The king, having pledged his faith and recovered his men who had been taken
- 8 prisoner, received the race in surrender. Then camp was broken and he was carried in a soldier's litter. All the cavalry and the infantry vied with one another as to who should carry it ; the cavalry, with whom the king had been wont to enter battle, thought that it was a part of their privilege, the infantry on the other hand, since they themselves had been accustomed to carry their injured comrades, complained that their proper duty was being taken from them just at the
- 9 very time when the king had to be carried. Alexander, in so great a contention between the two parts of the army thinking that a choice would be difficult for him and displeasing to those who were passed over, ordered them to carry him by turns.
- 10 From there on the fourth day they came to the city of Maracanda ^a ; this city is begirt by a wall of seventy stadia, and the citadel is enclosed by another wall. Having left 1000 men as a guard of the city, he ravaged and burned the neighbouring villages.
- 11 Then envoys of the Abii, who are Scythians,^b arrived, who had been free since the death of Cyrus and were then ready to submit to Alexander. They were commonly regarded as the most just of the barbarians ; they abstained from warfare except in self-defence, and because of their moderate and impartial practice of freedom they had made the Having addressed them courteously, Alexander sent one of his friends, Derdas, to those Scythians who dwell in Europe; he was to command them not to cross the Tanais ^a river without the king's order. He charged the same messengers to reconnoitre the country and to visit those Scythians also who dwell above ^b the Bosphorus.

- 13 He had chosen a site for founding a city on the bank of the Tanais, ^c as a barrier both to those who had already been subdued and to those whom he had decided to attack later; but his design was put off by the reported revolt of the Sogdiani, which also
- 14 involved the Bactriani. These consisted of 7000 cavalry, whose authority the rest followed.

Alexander ordered Spitamenes and Catanes to be summoned, by whom Bessus had been delivered to him, not doubting that by their aid they ^d could be reduced into his power by the suppression of those 15 who had stirred up a revolt. But they, being the ringleaders of the revolt to the suppression of which they were summoned, had spread abroad the report that all the Bactrian cavalry were being sent for by the king, in order that they might be slain, but that they however could not bring themselves to execute this order which had been given them, for fear of committing an inexpiable crime against their countrymen. That they had been no more able to endure the savage cruelty of Alexander than the parricide of Bessus. Therefore they aroused to arms without difficulty those who were already of their own accord alarmed by fear of punishment.

- 16 Alexander, on learning of the rebellion of the deserters, ordered Craterus to besiege Cyropolis; he himself took another city of the same region by circumvallation, and when the order had been given that all the men fit for service should be killed, the rest became booty for the victor. The city was razed, in order that the rest might be held to their allegiance
- 17 by the example of its destruction. The Memaceni,^a a powerful race, had decided to stand a siege, as not only more honourable, but also as safer; to tame their obstinacy, the king sent ahead fifty horsemen, to make known to them his clemency towards those who surrendered and his inexorable spirit towards
- 18 the vanquished. They replied that they did not doubt the good faith and clemency of the king and ordered the horsemen to encamp outside the fortifications of the city; then, having entertained them hospitably, they attacked them in the dead of night, when they were heavy with feasting and sleep,
- 19 and slew them. Alexander, incensed as was quite natural, surrounded the city with a line of troops, since it was too well fortified to be taken at the first assault. Therefore he united Meleager and Perdiccas in its siege, and he himself rejoined Craterus, who was besieging Cyropolis, as was said before.
- 20 However, he had decided to spare this city, since it was founded by Cyrus; for there were no other of those nations whom he admired more than that king and Semiramis,^b who he believed had far excelled all others in the greatness of their courage and the glory
- 21 of their deeds. But the obstinacy of the inhabitants so inflamed his anger, that, after taking the city, he ordered it to be ravaged. Having destroyed it,

- not unreasonably filled with indignation against the Memaceni, he returned to Meleager and Perdicas.
- 22 But no other city withstood siege more stoutly; for the bravest of his soldiers fell and the king himself was exposed to extreme danger. For his neck was struck with a stone with such force that darkness veiled his eyes and he fell and even lost consciousness; the army in fact lamented as if he had already
- 23 been taken from them. But unconquered in the face of what terrifies other men, he pressed on the siege before the wound had yet been wholly healed, anger spurring on his natural speed. Therefore, his men having undermined ^a the walls and opened a great breach, he burst through it into the city, and when victor ordered it to be razed.
- 24 Next he sent Menedemus with 3000 infantry and 800 cavalry to the city of Maracanda. Within the walls of this city the deserter Spitamenes, after driving out the Macedonian garrison, had shut himself, although the inhabitants did not fully approve of his design of revolt; yet they were thought to consent to
- 25 it, since they could not prevent it. Meanwhile Alexander returned to the Tanais and surrounded with a wall all the space which he had occupied with his camp; the wall of the city measured sixty stadia. This city also he ordered to be called Alexandria.^b
- 26 The work was completed with such speed, that seventeen days ^c after the fortifications were raised the buildings of the city also were finished. There had been great rivalry of the soldiers with one another, that each band—for the work was divided—might be inhabitants for the new city prisoners ^a were chosen, whom he freed by paying the masters their price ; even now their posterity after so long a time have not ceased to enjoy consideration among those peoples because of the memory of Alexander.

VII. But the king of the Scythians, whose rule at that time extended beyond the Tanais, thinking that this city which the Macedonians had founded on the bank of the river was a yoke upon their necks, ^b sent his brother, Carthasis by name, with a large force of cavalry to demolish it and drive off the Macedonian forces. The Tanais separates the Bactriani from the so-called European Scythians, and is also the boundary between Asia and Europe. ^c But the Scythian race which is situated not far from Thrace extends from the east towards the north, and is not a neighbour of the Sarmatians, as some have believed, but a part of them. ^d Then keeping straight on, it inhabits the forest lying beyond the Danube, and borders the extremity of Asia at Bactra. They inhabit the parts which are nearer to the north, then dense forests and desert wastes meet them. Again, the parts which look towards the Tanais and Bactra in human cultivation are not unlike the first.

Alexander, about to wage an unforeseen war with this race, when the enemy rode up in sight of him, although still ailing from his wound, and especially feeble of voice, which both moderation in food and the pain in his neck had weakened, ordered his friends to be called to a conference. It was not the enemy that

It was the custom of the diviners to examine the entrails without the presence of the king, and to report what these portended.
9. Meanwhile the king, while they were trying by inspection of the entrails of the victims to learn the result of hidden events, purposely bade his friends to sit very near him, in order that he might not, by exerting his voice, break the scab of his wound, which was still tender. Hephaestion, Craterus, and Eri-

are attacking us without provocation, we shall return 12 an object of contempt to those who have revolted ; if however we cross the Tanais and show by the defeat and slaughter of the Scythians that we are everywhere invincible, who will hesitate to obey those who 13 are victors even over Europe also ? He is deceived who measures our glory by the space which we are about to cross. A single river flows between us ; if 14 we cross that, we carry our arms into Europe. And how highly must it be regarded, while we are subjugating Asia, to set up trophies in what might be called another world, and suddenly to join in one victory places which Nature seems to have separated by so 15 great a space ? But, by Heaven ! if we delay even a short time, the Scythians will be close at our backs. Are we the only ones that can swim across rivers ? Many inventions will recoil upon us by which we have so far 16 been victorious. The fortune of war teaches its art even to the vanquished. We have lately set them the example of crossing a river on skins ^a ; even if the Scythians do not know how to imitate this, the Bac-17 triani will teach them. Besides, only one army of this nation has yet arrived, the rest are expected.
 Hence by avoiding war, we shall give it strength, and in a war in which we can take the offensive we shall be reduced to defence.

23 Having silenced him, Alexander, confused, not by anger alone, but also by shame because the superstition which he had concealed was revealed, ordered 24 Aristander to be summoned. When he came, the king, gazing sternly at him, said: "Not as king, but secretly as a private person, I ordered you to offer a sacrifice. Why did you announce what was portended by it to another rather than to me? Through your indiscretion Erigyus knew my private and secret affairs, and, by Heaven! I feel sure that he uses his

 Aristander appeared, declaring that at no other time had he seen more favourable entrails ; especially were they very different from the former ones ; that then causes for anxiety had appeared, but that now the sacrifice had turned out exceptionally favourable.^a 30 But what was presently announced to the king had inflicted a stain on the continual good fortune of 31 his enterprises. He had sent Menedemus, as was said before,^b to besiege Spitamenes, the author of the defection of the Bactriani ; Spitamenes, having learned of the coming of the enemy, in order not to be shut within the walls of the city, and at the same time trusting that Menedemus could be taken unawares, had secretly laid an ambuscade where he knew that 32 Menedemus would come. The road was covered with woods and adapted to conceal the ambush ; there he hid the Dahae. Each of their horses carries two riders, of whom in turn one suddenly dismounts 33 and confuses the order of a cavalry battle. The speed of the men is equal to the swiftness of their horses.

 These, which had been ordered to surround the woods, Spitamenes showed at the same time on the flanks, 34 in front, and in the rear of the enemy. Menedemus, hemmed in on all sides, although not even equal in numbers, yet resisted for a long time, crying that since they had been deceived by an ambuscade, no solace was left for them except that of an honourable death, a solace arising from the slaughter of the enemy.

- 35 He himself rode a very powerful horse, by which often carried at full speed into solid blocks of barbarian 36 troops, he routed them with great carnage. But when they all attacked him alone, and he was drained of blood by many wounds, he urged Hypsicles, one of his friends, to mount his horse and save himself by flight. As he was saying this, life left him, and his body slipped down ^a from his horse to the ground.
37 Hypsicles could in fact have escaped, but after losing his friend he resolved to die. His only care was, not to fall unavenged ; therefore, spurring on his horse, he plunged into the midst of the enemy, and having fought a memorable fight, was overwhelmed by their 38 weapons. When those who had survived the carnage saw that, they took position on an eminence a little higher than the rest of the field ; there Spitamenes besieged them, hoping by starvation to drive 39 them to surrender. There fell in that battle 2000 foot and 300 horsemen. Alexander with crafty prudence concealed this disaster, threatening with death those who had returned from the battle, if they made public what had happened.

- VIII. But when he could no longer bear an expression which belied his feelings, he withdrew to his tent, which he had purposely placed on the bank of the 2 river. There without witnesses, weighing his plans one by one, he spent the night sleepless, often raising the skins of the tent to look at the enemies' fires, from which he could calculate how great their number of 3 men was. And already daylight was at hand, when, putting on his cuirass, he went out to the soldiers, for the first time since the recent wound which he 4 had suffered. So great was their veneration for the king, that his presence readily dispelled all thought 5 of the danger which they dreaded. Happy therefore and shedding tears of joy, they saluted him, and confidently demanded the battle which they had before 6 refused. He announced that he was going to transport the cavalry and the phalanx on rafts, and he ordered the lighter-armed troops to swim, sup-7 ported by inflated skins. The situation did not call for more words, nor could the king say more because of his illness. But the rafts were put together with such enthusiasm on the part of the soldiers, that within three days about 12,000 were finished.

8 And already they had prepared everything for crossing, when twenty envoys of the Scythians, according to the custom of their race^a riding through the camp on horseback, ordered announcement to be made to the king that they desired to deliver a 9 message to him. Being admitted to the tent and invited to be seated, they had fixed their eyes on the king's face, because, I suppose, to those who estimated spirit by bodily stature his moderate size 10 seemed by no means equal to his reputation. However, the comprehension of the Scythians is not so rude and untrained as that of the rest of the barbarians; in fact, some of them are even said to pick up something of philosophy, so far as a race that is 11 always in arms is capable of such knowledge. Hence what they are reported to have said to the king is perhaps foreign to our customs and our orators, who have been allotted more cultivated times and intellects. But although their speech may be scorned, 24 Therefore hold your fortune with tight hands^a; she is slippery and cannot be held against her will. Wholesome advice will be better shown by the future than by the present. Put curbs upon your good fortune; 25 you will manage it the more easily. Our people say that Fortune is without feet, she has only hands and wings; when she stretches out her hands, grasp her wings also.

- IX. In reply the king responded that he would make use of his own fortune and of their advice ; for he would follow his fortune, in which he had confidence, and the advice of those who persuaded him 2 not to do anything rash and reckless. Having dismissed the envoys, he embarked his army on the rafts which he had prepared beforehand. On the prows he had stationed those who carried bucklers, with orders to sink upon their knees, in order that they might be safer against the shots of arrows.
 3 Behind these stood those who worked the hurling-engines,^a surrounded both on each side and in front by armed men. The rest, who were placed behind the artillery, armed with shields in testudo-formation, defended the rowers, who were not protected 4 by corselets. The same order was observed also on those rafts which carried the cavalry. The greater part of these let their horses swim astern, held by the reins. But the men who were carried on skins stuffed with straw were protected by the rafts that came between them and the foe.
 5 The king himself with a select band of troops was the first to cast off a raft and to order it to be directed against the opposite bank. To him the Scythians opposed ranks of horsemen moved up to the very margin of the bank, that the rafts might not be 6 able even to reach the land. Moreover, besides the sight of the army guarding the banks, great terror had seized those who were managing the rafts ; for the steersmen could not direct their course, since they were driven in a slanting direction,^b and the soldiers, who kept their feet with difficulty and were worried by fear of being shaken overboard, threw 7 into confusion ^a the work of the boatmen. Although making every effort the soldiers could not even hurl their javelins, since they thought rather of keeping their footing without danger than of attacking the enemy. Their safety was the hurling-engines, from which bolts were hurled with effect against the enemy, who were crowded together and recklessly exposed 8 themselves. The barbarians also poured such a great amount of arrows upon the rafts, that there was hardly a single shield that was not pierced by many of their 9 points at the same time. And now the rafts were being brought to land, when those who were armed with bucklers rose in a body and with sure aim, since they had firm footing, hurled their spears from the rafts. And as soon as they saw that the horses were terrified and drawing back, inspired by mutual encouragement, they began to leap to land and 10 vigorously to charge the disordered barbarians. Then the troops of horsemen, who had their horses bridled, broke through the enemies' line. In the meantime the rest, being covered by those who were fighting, 11 prepared themselves for battle. The king himself by the vigour of his courage made up for what he still lacked in bodily strength because of his illness. His words of encouragement could not be heard, since the old wound on his neck was not yet wholly healed, but 12 all saw him fighting. And so they themselves played the part of leaders, and urging one another against the enemy, they began to rush upon them, regardless of their lives.

 13 Then truly the barbarians could not endure the faces, the arms, nor the shouts of the enemy, but all with loose rein—for it was an army of cavalry—took

- flight. The king, although he was unable to endure the tossing of his ailing body, yet persisted in pursuing them for eighty stadia. And when finally his strength gave out, he ordered his men, so long as any light remained, to follow at the backs of the fugitives, he himself, having exhausted even his strength of mind, returned to the camp and remained there.
- 15 Already they had passed the bounds of Father Bacchus, which were marked by stones set up at frequent intervals and by tall trees whose trunks
- 16 were covered with ivy. But the wrath of the Macedonians carried them still farther; for it was nearly midnight when they returned to camp, after having slain many and taken still more prisoners, and they drove off 1800 horses. But of the Macedonians there fell sixty horsemen and about one hundred foot-soldiers; 1000 were wounded.
- 17 This campaign by the fame of so opportune a victory completely subdued Asia, which in great part was revolting.^a They had believed that the Scythians were invincible; after their defeat they confessed that no nation would be a match for the Macedonians. Accordingly the Sacae^b sent envoys
- 18 to promise that they would submit; the valour of the king had not influenced them more than his clemency towards the conquered Scythians. For he had sent back all the prisoners without a ransom, in order to make it appear that his rivalry with the most warlike nations was in bravery and not in

- 20 The king himself, having ordered Craterus with the greater part of the army to follow by moderate marches, went on to the city of Maracanda.^a From there Spitamenes, on learning of his coming, had 21 fled to Bactra.^b Accordingly the king, having in four days traversed a great extent of country, had reached the place where, under the lead of Menedemus, he had lost 2000 foot-soldiers and 300 cavalry. He ordered the bones of these to be covered with a mound and offered sacrifice to the spirits of the dead^c 22 in the Macedonian fashion. Now Craterus, who had been ordered to follow with the phalanx, had rejoined the king; accordingly, in order that all who had revolted might alike be visited with the disasters of war, he divided his forces and gave orders that the fields should be set on fire and that all who were of military age should be killed.

- 5 bodies. The king, surprised at their facing death with such greatness of spirit, ordered them to be recalled, and inquired the reason for such transports of joy when they had execution before their eyes.
- 6 They replied that if they were to be killed by anyone else they would have died sorrowful ; as it was, being restored to their ancestors by so great a king, conqueror of all nations, they were celebrating by their usual songs and with rejoicing a glorious death, which brave men might even pray for.
- 7 Admiring such great courage, Alexander said : “ I ask you whether you would wish to live on condition of not being unfriendly to me to whose favour
- 8 you will owe your lives.” They replied that they had never been unfriendly to him, but that when provoked to war they were enemies of their foe. If one had preferred to try them with kindness rather than with injury, they would have striven not to be
- 9 outdone in courtesy. And when asked by what pledge they would bind their loyalty, they said that the life which was granted them would be their pledge ; that they would pay it when he demanded it. And they kept their promise. For those who were then sent to their homes have by their good faith held their fellow-citizens together ; four, who were retained as a part of his body-guard, yielded to none of the Macedonians in affection for the king.
- 10 Having left Peucolaüs among the Sogdiani with 3000 infantry—for he needed no larger force—Alexander came to Bactra. From there he ordered

Bessus to be taken to Ecbatana,^a to expiate with 11 his life his murder of Darius. At about the same time Ptolemy and Melanidas^b brought the king 4000 infantry and 1000 horsemen, to serve as mer-12 cenaries. Asander^c also came from Lycia with an equal number of foot-soldiers and 500 horsemen. The same number followed Asclepiodorus from Syria.
 Antipater had sent 8000 Greeks, among whom were 13 600 cavalry. With his army thus increased the king marched forth to set in order the provinces which had been disordered by the revolt; and after putting to death the ringleaders of the disturbance, he returned on the fourth day to the river Oxus. This river, because it carries silt, is always turbid and unwhole-14 some to drink. Therefore the soldiers had begun to dig wells; yet, although they excavated the soil to a great depth, they found no water. At length a spring was found right in the king's tent,^d and because they had been late in perceiving it, they spread the report that it had suddenly appeared, and the king himself wished it to be believed that it was a 15 gift of the gods. Then he crossed the rivers Ochus^e and Oxus and came to the city of Margiana. Round about it six sites were chosen for founding towns, two facing south and four east; they were distant from one another only a moderate space, so that they might be able to aid one another without seeking help from a distance. All these were situated on 16 high hills. At that time they served as curbs upon the conquered nations; to-day, forgetful of their origin, they serve those over whom they once ruled.

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, VII. xi. 1-8

There was one rock, which Ariamazes, a native of Sogdiana, was holding with 30,000 armed men, having previously stored there provisions sufficient 2 to support so great a force for fully two years. The rock rises to a height of 30 stadia, and embraces a circuit of 150; it is scarped on every side and 3 approached by a very steep and narrow path. In the middle of its ascent it has a cavern, the entrance of which is narrow and obscure; then farther in it gradually widens, and finally even contains deep recesses. Springs flow almost everywhere in the cavern, and the waters which gather in these send forth a river down the steep sides of the mountain.
4 The king, having seen the difficulty of the place, had decided to leave it; then a desire entered his mind 5 to wear out even Nature's strength. Nevertheless, before trying the fortune of a siege, he sent Cophes—he was a son of Artabazus—to the barbarians, to persuade them to surrender the rock. Ariamazes, trusting to his position, made several arrogant replies, and finally asked whether Alexander could even fly.
6 When this was reported to the king, it so inflamed his mind, that summoning those with whom he was wont to consult, he told them of the insolence of the barbarian, who mocked at them because they did not have wings; but that he on the following night would make him believe that the Macedonians 7 could even fly. "Let each of you," said he, "bring me 300 of the most active young men from your forces, who at home were accustomed to drive their flocks over mountain pastures and almost impass-8 able rocks." They quickly brought that number, who excelled in bodily agility and in ardour of courage. The king, looking them over, said: "It is with ^c Iron wedges to ram between the steeper rocks and thus provide footholds. Arrian (iv. 19. 1) speaks of tent-pegs, to be fixed in the snow, or in the ground where it was bare of snow.

- you, O youths, my comrades, that I have overcome the fortifications of cities that before now were unconquered, that I have traversed the heights of mountains buried in perpetual snow, that I entered the passes of Cilicia, and have endured the intense cold of India ^a without fatigue. I have given you 9 proofs of myself, and I have had proofs of you. The rock which you see has only one approach, which the barbarians beset, they neglect the rest; they have no sentinels except those that are watching our 10 camp. You will find a way, if you seek carefully for paths leading to the top. Nature has placed nothing so high, that valour cannot overcome it. It is by trying what others have despaired of that we have 11 Asia in our power. Go up to the summit; when you have attained it, you will give me a signal with white cloths. I will bring up forces and divert the enemy 12 from you to us. The reward for him who first reaches the top will be ten talents ^b; he who comes next will receive one less, and the same proportion will be maintained up to the number of ten men. But I am sure that you will have an eye, not so much to the reward, as to my desire."
- 13 They heard the king with such alacrity, that it seemed that they had already attained the summit; and when dismissed they prepared iron wedges to 14 insert between the stones, ^c and strong ropes. The king rode around the rock, and where the approach seemed least rough and steep he ordered them to set out in the second watch, uttering a prayer to the gods for success. ^d They, taking food sufficient for two days, and armed only with swords and lances, 15 began to climb up. And at first they advanced on

- 16 They spent a day amid fear and toil. After having struggled over rough places, still harder ones awaited them, and the height of the rock seemed to grow. That indeed was a pitiful sight,^b when those whom their unsteady step had betrayed were hurled down a sheer drop ; and the example of others' disaster showed that they must soon suffer the same fate.
- 17 Nevertheless, through all these difficulties they mounted to the top of the mountain, all worn out by the fatigue of constant toil, some maimed ^c in a part of their limbs, and night and sleep came upon them
- 18 together. With their bodies stretched here and there on the pathless and rough rocks, they forgot their dangerous situation and slept until daybreak^d ; and when at last they awakened as from a deep slumber, examining the hidden valleys that lay below them, and not knowing in what part of the rock so great a force of the enemy was hidden, they saw smoke rolling out from a cavern below them.
- 19 From this they knew that it was the hiding place of the enemy. Therefore they raised on their spears the signal which had been agreed upon ; and they found that out of their whole number thirty-two had perished during the ascent.
- 20 The king, harassed not more from desire of taking the place than for the possible fate of those whom he had sent into such evident danger, stood during the

- whole day, looking at the summit of the mountain ; not until night, when darkness prevented him from 21 seeing, did he withdraw for repose. On the following day,^a before it was yet broad daylight, he was the first to see the cloths that showed that the top was taken. But the changing sky, where now a gleam of light shown through, which again was hidden,^b compelled him to doubt whether his eyes did not deceive him. But as a clearer light appeared in the 22 heavens, his doubt was dispelled ; and having summoned Cophes, through whom he had tested the feelings of the barbarians, he sent him to them, to warn them now at least to adopt a better purpose ; but if they persisted through confidence in their situation, he ordered that those who had taken possession of the summit should be pointed out to them.
 23 Cophes, being admitted, began to urge Ariamazes to surrender the rock, saying that he would gain the king's favour if, while he was engaged in such great enterprises, he should not delay him in the siege of a single rock. He, speaking more fiercely and arro-24 gantly than before, ordered Cophes to depart ; but he took the barbarian by the hand and asked him to go with him outside the cave. When he had complied, Cophes showed him the young men on the summit, and with good reason mocking his arrogance, said that the soldiers of Alexander had wings.
 25 And now from the camp of the Macedonians the notes of the trumpets and the shouts of the whole army were heard. This, like many other things in war, although vain and empty,^c moved the barbarians to surrender ; for seized with fear, they were unable to estimate rightly the small number of those who were 26 in their rear. Therefore they quickly recalled Cophes,

CONTENTS OF BOOK VIII

The Massagetae, Dahae and Sogdiani are subdued. The Scythians offer their king's daughter in marriage to Alexander. He kills Clitus at a banquet for speaking too frankly (i).

The king's grief and repentance; the Macedonians decide that Clitus was deservedly slain. He advances against the Bactriani and Sisimithres. Death of Philip and of Erigyus (ii).

Alexander expels from his camp the wife of Spitamenes, who brings him her husband's head. He frees several provinces from the oppression of his governors (iii).

The army on its way to Gazaba is almost destroyed by the cold; Alexander's endurance and courage; his kindness to a common soldier. Oxyartes submits; Alexander marries his daughter Roxane (iv).

As his thoughts turn towards war in India, Alexander supplies his troops with costly weapons. Influenced by flatterers, he orders the Macedonians to salute him in the Persian fashion, which calls forth a severe speech from Callisthenes (v).

Hermolaüs, one of the royal pages, having suffered punishment, forms a conspiracy against Alexander's life. When it is detected, Callisthenes is suspected of complicity and is imprisoned along with the conspirators (vi).

When allowed to speak in his own defence, Hermolaüs inveighs against the haughtiness and cruelty of Alexander; he denies that Callisthenes is implicated in the conspiracy (vii).

Alexander replies at length to Hermolaüs; he orders the death of Callisthenes as well as that of the conspirators (viii).

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, VIII

Alexander marches into India. A description of the country : its rivers, climate, animals, and wealth ; the various classes of its people ; the luxury of the kings, the manner of life and the wisdom of the gymnosophists (ix).

Alexander receives the submission of some of the princes of India, and conquers various cities and regions which resist him. He is wounded in the siege of Magazae, and admits that he is mortal, though called the son of Jupiter (x).

After much toil he takes the city of Hora and the crag of Aornus, formerly vainly attempted by Hercules (xi).

He crosses the Indus and restores his rule to Omphis, who had surrendered himself and his kingdom. The kings exchange gifts (xii).

Alexander encamps at the river Hydaspes and makes war on Porus ; by a clever stratagem he divides Porus' forces and crosses the river and takes possession of the opposite bank (xiii).

The hard-fought battle of the Macedonians and the Indi ; Porus is defeated but shows a lofty spirit, which wins Alexander's clemency and friendship (xiv).

I. ALEXANDER, having brought the rock under his sway with more fame than glory,^a divided the army into three parts, since the roving nature of the enemy made it necessary for him to spread his forces about.^b He gave the lead of one part to Hephæstion, of a second to Coenus, and he himself commanded the 2 third. But the barbarians were not all of the same mind; some were subdued by his arms, still more submitted without a contest. To the latter he ordered to be assigned the cities and lands of those 3 who had persisted in rebellion. But the Bactriani who had been dispossessed devastated, in company with 900 horsemen of the Massagetæ, the neighbouring villages. To check them, Attinas,^c the governor of that region, led out 300 horsemen, being unaware of the ambushade that was being laid.
4 For in the woods—and it chanced that they were close to a plain—the enemy hid an armed force, while a few drove flocks before them, in order that the hope of booty might lead Attinas unawares into the 5 snare. Accordingly he, marching in disorder and in loose formation, was following them, thinking only of plunder ; but when he had passed by the woods, those who had taken post there suddenly attacked him and slew him with all his men.

- 6 The report of this disaster was quickly brought to Craterus, who came to the spot ^a with all his cavalry. The Massagetæ, for their part, had already fled, but 1000 of the Dahæ were slain, and by their slaughter
- 7 the rebellion of the whole region was ended. Alexander also, having again subdued the Sogdiani, returned to Maracanda. There Derdas, whom he had sent to the Scythians dwelling east of the Bosphorus,^b met him with envoys of that people.
- 8 Phrataphernes also, satrap of the Chorasmii,^c a neighbour to the Massagetæ and the Dahæ, had sent

The Scythians asked that he should marry the daughter of their king ; if he considered her unworthy of the alliance, that he should suffer the leading men of the Macedonians to contract marriages with the great ladies of his race ^d ; they promised that the king himself

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, VIII. i. 13-20

Alexander, entering it with his whole army, ordered 14 an attack on the wild beasts from every side. Among these when a lion of extraordinary size rushed to attack the king himself, it happened that Lysimachus, who was afterwards a king,^a being beside Alexander, began to oppose his hunting-spear to the animal ; but the king pushed him aside and ordered him to retire, adding that a lion could be killed by 15 himself alone as well as by Lysimachus. And in fact Lysimachus, once when they were hunting in Syria, had indeed alone killed a lion of remarkable size, but had had his left shoulder torn to the bone 16 and thus had come into great peril of his life. The king, taunting him with this very experience, acted more vigorously than he spoke ; for he not only met the wild beast, but killed him with a single wound.
17 I am inclined to believe that the story which without evidence spread the report ^b that Lysimachus was exposed by the king to the attack of a lion arose from the incident which we have just mentioned.
18 But the Macedonians, although Alexander had been successful in his attempt, nevertheless voted in the manner of their nation that he should neither hunt on foot nor without being accompanied by selected 19 officers or friends. He, after having laid low 4000 wild beasts, banqueted in that same park with his entire army.

From there the king returned to Maracanda ; and having accepted Artabazus' excuse of old age, he 20 made over his province ^c to Clitus. It was he, an old soldier of Philip and distinguished by many exploits in war,^d who at the river Granicus ^e covered the Cavalry, and later shared with Hephaestion the command of the whole troop.

- king with his shield when he was fighting bareheaded, and with his sword cut off the hand of Rhosaces, when 21 it threatened the king's life. And Hellanicê,^a his sister, who had reared Alexander, was loved by the king as dearly as if she were his own mother. It was for these reasons that he entrusted to Clitus' faith and protection the strongest part of his empire.^b 22 And now, after being bidden to prepare for a march on the following day, Clitus was invited to one of the king's usual prolonged banquets.^c There, when the king had been heated by an abundance of wine, having an immoderate opinion of himself, he began to boast of his exploits, to the displeasure even of the ears of those who knew that what he said was true.
 23 But the older men remained silent until he began to belittle^d the deeds of Philip and to boast that the famous victory at Chaeronea^e had been his work, but that the glory of so great a battle had been taken from him by the malignity and jealousy of his father.
 24 That Philip, when a quarrel had arisen between the Macedonian soldiers and the Greek mercenaries, being disabled by a wound which he had suffered during that disturbance, had fallen to the ground and could find no other expedient to protect himself better than feigning death; but that he had protected his father's body with his shield, and with his own hand 25 had slain those who were rushing upon him. This Philip could never bring himself to admit, being unwilling to be indebted for his life to his son. Also, that after the campaign which he himself had made without Philip against the Illyrians,^f when victorious he had written to his father that the enemy had been routed and put to flight; and that Philip had 26 nowhere been present. He said that praise was due, not to those who had witnessed the initiatory rites of Samothrace ^a at a time when Asia should have been laid waste by fire, but to those who by the greatness of their deeds had surpassed belief.

- 27 These and similar things the young soldiers heard with pleasure, but they were odious to the older men, especially because of Philip, under whom they 28 had lived longer, when Clitus, who was himself by no means wholly sober, turned to those who were reclining below him, and quoted a line of Euripides ^b in such a tone that the sound could be heard by the king 29 rather than the words made out, to the effect that it was a bad custom of the Greeks to inscribe on their trophies only the names of kings ; for the kings stole the glory won by the blood of others. Therefore Alexander, for he suspected that the words had been somewhat malicious, began to ask those next to him 30 what they had heard Clitus say. And when they maintained an obstinate silence, Clitus, gradually raising his voice, spoke of the deeds of Philip and the wars which he had waged in Greece, rating them 31 all higher than the present victories. From this there arose a dispute between the younger and the older soldiers. And the king, although he appeared to hear with patience the words in which Clitus belittled his glory, had become exceedingly angry. But when it seemed that he would control himself if Clitus would put an end to the talk which he had wantonly begun, as he did not in any way moderate it, the king became more exasperated.
 33 And now Clitus even ventured to defend Parmenion and extolled the victory of Philip over the Athenians ^c above the destruction of Thebes, being carried away, not only by wine, but by a perverse spirit of conten-

- 38 Nothing among all the taunts which Clitus had inconsiderately and rashly uttered had more aroused the king than the honourable mention made of Parmenion.^e Yet he restrained his resentment, content
- 39 with ordering Clitus to leave the banquet. And he added nothing else than that perhaps if Clitus had spoken at greater length, he would have taunted him with having saved his life; for of this he had often
- 40 arrogantly boasted. And when Clitus still delayed to rise, those who had reclined next to him laid hands upon him and with remonstrances and warning were drunkenness, and he shouted that the king's back had been protected by his own breast, but that now, after the time of so great a service had passed, even 42 the memory of it was odious. Then he also reproached the king with the murder of Attalus,^a and finally, mocking the oracle of Jupiter, whom Alexander claimed as his father, he said that he himself had spoken to the king more truly than his "father" had done.

43 By now Alexander was filled with such great wrath as he could hardly have mastered when sober. In fact, his senses having long since been overcome by 44 wine, he suddenly leaped from his couch. His friends, in a panic, having not even put down their cups but thrown them aside, arose in a body, their thoughts centred upon the result of the act which he was about 45 to commit with such impetuosity. Alexander, wrestling a lance from the hands of one of his guards, and attempting to kill Clitus, who was still raging with the same unbridled language, was prevented by Ptolemy 46 and Perdiccas. Throwing their arms about his waist, they kept holding him back while he continued to struggle; Lysimachus and Leonnatus had even taken 47 away the lance; the king, invoking the loyalty of his soldiers, cried that he was being seized by his closest friends, as had lately happened to Darius,^b and ordered the signal to be given with the trumpet for the soldiers to take arms and come to the royal quarters.
 48 Then truly Ptolemy and Perdiccas threw themselves at his knees and besought him not to persist in such unrestrained anger, but rather to take time for reflection; that to-morrow he would manage the 49 whole matter with more justice. But his ears were closed, deafened by wrath; and so, beside himself,

^a Curtius' account is less favourable to Alexander than those of Arrian, Plutarch, and Justin, who represent him as killing Clitus more in the heat of passion, at table or when he first rushed back into the dining-room.

he rushed into the vestibule of the royal quarters, and snatching a lance from the sentinel on guard, stood at the entrance where those who had dined with him must pass out. The rest had gone, and Clitus was coming out last without a light, when the king asked who it was. Even his voice clearly indicated the ferocity of the crime which he meditated. And Clitus, no longer mindful of his own anger, but remembering that of the king, replied that it was Clitus and that he was leaving the banquet. As he was saying this the king ran the lance into his side, and bespattered with the blood of the dying man, cried: "Go now" to Philip and Parmenion and Attalus!"

II. Nature has dealt ill with men's minds, in that we generally weigh acts, not beforehand, but after they are done. For the king, after anger had left his mind and even his intoxication had been dispelled,^b clearly perceived, but too late, the enormity of his crime. He saw then that he had killed a man who had indeed immoderately abused freedom of speech, but who in any case was eminent in warfare, and if he was not ashamed to admit it, the saviour of his life. A king had usurped the detestable function of an executioner, and had punished licence in language, which might have been imputed to wine, by an abominable murder. The whole vestibule swam with the blood of one who but now had been his guest, the sentinels stood aloof from him, amazed and as if stupefied, and solitude gave freer opportunity for repentance. Therefore, tearing the lance from the body of the prostrate man, he turned it upon himself. And he had already brought it against his breast, when the sentinels flew to him, and in spite of his resistance wrested it from his hand, lifted him up,

- 6 Amid prayers like these the whole night was spent. And while he was considering whether he had been driven to commit such a great crime by the anger of the gods, it occurred to him that he had not paid the annual sacrifice to Father Liber at the appointed time. Hence it was evident that the murder committed amid wine and feasting was a manifestation
- 7 of the anger of that god. But the king was still more disturbed because he saw that the minds of all his friends were terror-stricken, that no one would dare hereafter to converse ^a with him, but he must live in solitude like a savage beast which now inspires terror in other beasts and at other times is itself in fear
- 8 of them. Later, at dawn, he ordered the body to be taken into his tent, all bloody as it still was. When it was placed before him, he said with eyes filled with tears : " This is my requital to my nurse,^b whose two sons met death at Miletus for my glory, this her brother, the sole comfort of her bereave-

^c Of 328-327 B.C. Curtius adds in viii. 8. 21 that after the execution of the "conspirators" whom the Macedonians agreed to be guilty the king had the Olynthian philosopher Callisthenes tortured to death.

- 11 The king lay in seclusion for three days.^a When his attendants and body-guards knew that he was resolved upon dying, they all burst into the tent, and although for a long time he resisted their entreaties, they with difficulty prevailed upon him to take food.
- 12 And in order that he might feel less shame for the murder, the Macedonians decreed^b that Clitus had been justly put to death, and that they would even have deprived him of funeral rites, if the king had not ordered that he be buried.
- 13 Then, after having spent ten days near Maracanda, chiefly that he might recover from his shame, he sent Hephaestion with a part of the army into the region
- 14 of Bactriana to prepare supplies for the winter.^c The province which he previously had intended for Clitus he gave to Amyntas. He himself came to Xenippa^d; this is a place bordering on Scythia, and it is occupied by many populous villages, since the fertility of the soil not only holds the natives but also attracts new-
- 15 comers. It had been the refuge of the Bactrian exiles who had revolted from Alexander; but after it was learned that the king was coming, these were driven out by the natives and were gathered together
- 16 to the number of about 2500. They were all horsemen, accustomed to brigandage even in time of peace; at that time too their savage natures had been made more reckless, not only by the war, but also by despair of pardon. Hence they made an unlooked-for attack upon Amyntas, a general of Alexander, and for a long time had held the contest in balance;
- 17 finally, after having lost 700 of their number, of whom the enemy took 300 prisoners, they turned mountains, a range that runs from east to west about ten miles north of Bokhara."

their backs to the victors, but by no means unavenged: for they killed eighty of the Macedonians, and 350 18 besides those suffered wounds. Yet they received pardon even after a second revolt.^a

19 After these had been received in surrender, the king with his whole army came into the region which they call Nautaca.^b The satrap was Sisimithres, who had two sons born of his own mother; for among those people it is lawful for parents to cohabit with 20 their children. He, having armed his subjects, had blocked the narrowest part of the entrance to the region with a strong fortification. Near by flowed a torrential river, which a crag in its rear protected; through this the natives had made artificially a 21 road, of which the entrance receives light through a cave, while the inner parts are dark unless a light has been carried in. A continuous passage, known only 22 to the natives, gives access to the plains. Although the barbarians with a strong force were guarding the pass, which was protected by its natural situation, nevertheless Alexander, bringing up his battering-rams, shattered the fortifications which had been artificially added, and laid low many of the defenders with slings and arrows.

When he had scattered these and put them to flight, passing over the ruins of the fortifications, he 23 brought his army to the crag. But the river intervened, where the waters from the summit came together and flowed into the valley, and it seemed a 24 task of great labour to fill up so vast an abyss; nevertheless he ordered trees to be felled and rocks to be brought together. And great panic had struck the barbarians, who were unfamiliar with such works, 25 when they saw a dam quickly ^a raised. As a result the king, thinking that they could be forced by fear to surrender, sent Oxartes, of that same nation but under his sway, to persuade their leader to deliver 26 over the crag. Meanwhile, to increase the dread, at the same time towers were brought up and bolts hurled from artillery leapt about. Accordingly, the enemy made for the top of the crag, disapproving all 27 other defence. But Oxartes began to urge Sisi-mithres, who was fearful and distrustful of his affairs, to try the faith rather than the strength of the Macedonians, and not to delay the haste of a victorious army which was on its way to India ; for anyone who opposed it would bring upon his own head the disaster aimed at others.

 28 And Sisimithres for his part was not disinclined to surrender, but his mother, who was also his wife, declaring that she would die rather than come into the power of any other, turned the mind of the barbarian to what was more honourable than safe, and he felt ashamed that freedom was more highly valued among the women than among the 29 men. Accordingly, dismissing the intermediary for peace, he had decided to stand a siege. But when he had repeatedly measured the strength of the enemy against his own, he began to regret having followed the advice of the woman, which seemed to 30 be rash rather than necessary, and quickly recalling Oxartes, he replied that he would surrender to the king, begging only this one thing, that he would not betray the advice and wish of his mother, in order that he might more easily obtain pardon for her also.
 31 Therefore, sending Oxartes ahead, he followed with his mother and children and with a band of all his kindred, not even waiting for the pledge of parole which 32 Oxartes had promised. The king, after sending on a horseman to order them to return and await his presence, came up, and having sacrificed victims to Minerva Victoria,^a restored his rule to Sisimithres, giving him hope of a still greater province if he cultivated his friendship with loyalty. He ordered Sisimithres' two sons, whom their father had delivered 33 to him, to follow, in order to serve as soldiers with him.

Then, having left ^b the phalanx to subdue those 34 who had revolted, he went on with the cavalry. The road, which was steep and impeded by rocks, they endured at first as well as they could; presently, when not only were the hooves of the horses worn down,^c but their bodies also were wearied, many were unable to follow and the line became thinner from time to time, the excessive toil overcoming 35 their shame, as usually happens. Yet the king, from time to time changing horses, pursued the fugitives without interruption.^d The young nobles who were accustomed to attend him ^e had given out except Philippus; he was a brother of Lysimachus, and had just arrived at manhood, and, as was readily apparent, 36 a youth of a rare character. He, incredible to relate, on foot for 500 stadia accompanied the mounted king, and although Lysimachus often offered him his horse, yet he could not be induced to leave Alexander's side, although he wore a cuirass and was carrying his arms.

37 This same youth, when they had come to the wood in which the barbarians had hidden, made a splendid fight and protected the king as he fought hand to 38 hand with the enemy. But after the barbarians left the wood in scattered flight, the spirit which had sustained the young man's body in the ardour of battle left him, and suddenly a sweat broke out on all his body and he leaned against the nearest tree-39 trunk. Then, when he was not sustained even by that support, he was taken in the king's arms, and there 40 swooned and died. In the midst of his sorrow another severe grief came to the king. Erigyius had been one of his illustrious generals^a; and he learned, a little before his return to the camp, that he had died. The funeral of each was performed with every splendour and honour.

III. Next he had decided to attack the Dahae; for he had learned that Spitamenes was there. But this affair, like many others, Fortune, never wearied in indulging him, finished for him in his absence.
 2 Spitamenes burned with immoderate love for his wife, whom he dragged with him as his companion into every danger, although she could hardly endure the toil of flight and constant changes of exile. She, worn out by hardships, from time to time made use of a woman's blandishments to persuade her husband at last to cease his flight, and having experienced Alexander's clemency, to placate one whom he could 3 not escape. She had borne him three children, who were now grown to manhood; having put these in their father's arms, she begged him to consent at least to pity them: and it gave greater effect to her 4 prayers that Alexander was not far off. Spitamenes, thinking that he was being betrayed, not advised, and that undoubtedly through confidence in her beauty his wife desired as soon as possible to be surrendered to Alexander, drew his scimitar and would have slain her if he had not been prevented by the hurried intervention of her brothers.

- 5 However he ordered her to quit his sight, adding a threat of death if she should show herself before his eyes, and to satisfy his longing he began to 6 pass his nights with concubines. But his deep-seated love was inflamed through disgust with his present associates. Therefore, again devoted to his wife alone, he did not cease to beg her to refrain from giving such advice, and to endure whatever lot Fortune should offer them, saying that to him death was a lighter 7 thing than surrender. But she excused herself for having advised what she thought expedient, perhaps with feminine weakness, but yet in a loyal spirit, saying that for the future she would submit to 8 her husband's authority. Spitamenes, won by this feigned compliance, ordered a prolonged^a banquet to be prepared, from which he was carried to his 9 chamber heavy with wine and half-asleep. As soon as his wife saw that he was sunk in a deep and heavy slumber, she drew a sword which she had hidden under her robe, cut off his head, and, bespattered with blood, handed it to a slave who had been her 10 accomplice in the crime. Attended by the slave, with her robe all blood-stained as it was, she came into the camp of the Macedonians and ordered it to be announced to Alexander that there was something 11 that he ought to hear from her own lips. He at once ordered the barbarian woman to be admitted. When he saw her bespattered with blood, thinking that she had come to complain of some outrage, he bade her 12 tell him what she wished. But she desired that the slave whom she had ordered to stand in the vestibule should be brought in.

- Because the slave had the head of Spitamenes hidden under his robe, he was suspected, and when some men searched him, he showed them what he was
- 13 hiding. A pallor had made the features of the bloodless face unrecognizable, and it could not be known who it was ; therefore the king, being informed that the slave was bringing a man's head, came out of his tent, and upon inquiring what had happened, learned
- 14 the truth from the slave's confession. Thereupon, as he considered the varied aspects of the case, his mind was moved by conflicting thoughts. He believed that it was a great service to him that a deserter and a traitor, who, if he had lived, would have caused delay to his important affairs, had been killed ; on the other hand, he was repelled by the great crime, in that the woman had treacherously killed a husband who deserved well of her, the father of their common
- 15 children. Yet the atrocity of the deed prevailed over gratitude for the service, and he ordered notice to be given her to leave the camp, lest by this example of barbarian lawlessness she might affect the character and mild dispositions of the Greeks.
- 16 The Dahae, learning of the murder of Spitamenes, bound Dataphernes, his partner in the revolt, and surrendered him and themselves to Alexander. dates might be recalled from there. In place of Mazaeus, who had died, Stamenes was made governor of Babylonia.

IV. After these matters had been arranged, he withdrew the army from winter quarters ^a after two months' stay, intending to go to the region which is called Gazaca.^b The first day allowed a quiet march, the following day was, it is true, not yet stormy and gloomy, yet it was darker than the preceding one, and did not pass without threat of growing trouble, on the third, lightning flickered from every quarter of the heavens, and the light which now shone through and now was hidden, began, not only to dazzle the eyes of the advancing army, but even to terrify them. There were almost continual peals of thunder, and bolts of lightning striking everywhere were seen, so that the army, stunned and deafened, dared neither to halt nor to advance; then suddenly a rain-storm bombarding them with hail poured upon them like a torrent. At first indeed they had received the hail successfully on the cover afforded by their shields, but finally their stiffened hands could no longer hold their slippery weapons,^c nor could they themselves determine in what direction to turn their bodies, since on every side greater violence of the storm met them than that which they were trying to avoid. Hence, having broken ranks, the army went wandering all through the woods, and many, worn out by fear (not yet by toil), had thrown themselves upon the ground, although the extreme cold had hardened the rain and hail into solid ice. Others had leaned against the trunks of trees; this served as a support and refuge for very many. But it did not escape them that they were choosing a place to die, since when they ceased to move, the vital heat left them; but inactivity of body was welcome to them in their weariness, nor did they shrink from dying as the price of resting. As a matter of fact, the force of the disastrous storm was not only violent but also persistent, and the light, that natural solace, in addition to the tempest, which was like night, was obscured also by the shade of the woods.

- 9 The king, who alone was able to endure such a disaster, went about among the soldiers, brought together those that were scattered, lifted up those who had fallen, and pointing out the distant smoke that rolled up from some huts, urged each man to resort to 10 the nearest places of refuge. And nothing contributed more to their safety than that they were ashamed to fail the king, who in spite of redoubled toil was able to endure the hardships to which they themselves 11 had succumbed. Moreover, necessity, which in adversity is more effective than reason, found a remedy for the cold; for they began to cut down the woods everywhere with adzes and set fire to the heaps 12 and piles of wood. You would have thought that the forest was ablaze with a continuous conflagration and that amid the flames hardly room was left for the troops. This heat aroused their benumbed bodies, and gradually their breath, which the cold had 13 checked, began to pass freely. Some took refuge in the huts of the barbarians, which necessity had tracked out though they were hidden in the inmost part of the woods, others in the camp which they pitched on ground that was indeed wet, but already the severity of the weather was moderating. stuck to the trunks of trees, looking as if they were not only alive but even talking together, still keeping the posture in which death had overtaken them.

- 15 It chanced that a Macedonian common soldier, hardly able to stand up and hold his weapons, had nevertheless reached the camp. On seeing him the king, although he himself was just then warming himself beside a fire, leaped up from his chair, and taking his armour from the exhausted and hardly 16 conscious soldier, bade him sit in his own seat. For a long time the man did not realize where he was resting nor by whom he had been rescued. At last, when he had recovered his vital heat and saw the 17 royal seat and the king, he arose in terror. Alexander, looking kindly at him, said: "Do you understand, soldier, how much better the lot of you soldiers is than if you were living under the king of Persia? For with the Persians, to have sat in the king's seat would have been a capital crime, with you it has saved your life." ^a

- 18 On the next day, having called together his friends and the leaders of his forces, he ordered it to be proclaimed that he himself would make good all that 19 had been lost. And he kept his promise. For Sisimithres had brought in many pack-animals ^b and 2000 camels, besides flocks and herds; these were distributed equally and saved the soldiers both from 20 loss and from hunger. The king, greatly pleased by the requital made him by Sisimithres, on his way to the Sacae ^c ordered the soldiers to carry with them cooked food enough for six days. Having devastated all that region, he gave Sisimithres a gift of 30,000 cattle from the booty.

- 23 which he entertained Alexander; while this was being celebrated with great friendliness, the satrap ordered thirty high-born maidens to be brought in. Among these was his own daughter, Roxanê by name, a maiden of remarkable beauty of person, and of a dignity of bearing uncommon among barbarians.
- 24 She, although she had entered among an elite group, yet drew the eyes of all to her, especially of the king, who by now had less mastery over his passions amid the constant indulgence of Fortune, against whom
- 25 mortal man is not sufficiently on his guard. And so he, who had looked upon the wife of Darius and his two maiden daughters, to whom none save Roxanê could be compared in beauty, with no other feeling than that of a father, was then so transported^b with love for this little maiden, of obscure birth in comparison with royal stock, that he said that it was important for establishing his empire that Persians and Macedonians be joined in wedlock; that only in that way could shame be taken from the conquered and
- 26 haughtiness from the victors. Achilles also, he said, from whom he traced his ancestry, had united with a captive maiden^c; lest the vanquished should think that a wrong was being done to them, he wished to be joined with Roxanê in lawful wedlock.

tide of his ardent passion, ordered a loaf of bread to be brought in according to his country's custom—this among the Macedonians was the most sacred pledge of those contracting marriage—which was cut in two 28 with a sword and tasted by each. I suppose that those who established the customs of the race wished by a frugal and common food to show to those who were about to unite their resources with how little 29 they ought to be contented. In this way the king of Asia and of Europe took to himself in wedlock a woman who had been brought in among the entertainments of a banquet, intending to beget from a captive 30 a son who should rule over victors. His friends were ashamed that a father-in-law had been chosen from among the surrendered amid wine and feasting, but since after the murder of Clitus freedom of speech had been banned, they pretended assent by expression of their faces,^a which most readily play the slave.

V. But the king, intending to go on to India and from there to the Ocean, lest there should be any disturbance in his rear which could interfere with his plans, ordered 30,000 of the younger men to be selected from all the provinces and brought to him under arms, intending to have them at once as host-2 ages and as soldiers. Furthermore, he sent Craterus in pursuit of Haustanes and Catanes,^b who had revolted from him, of whom Haustanes was taken prisoner, Catanes killed in battle. Polypercon^c also reduced to submission the region which is called knew said that the equipment of the soldiers gleamed with gold and ivory ; consequently Alexander, not to be outdone in anything, since he surpassed all other men, added silver plates to the shields and put golden bits on his horses, and adorned the cuirasses also, some with gold, others with silver. There were 120,000 armed men^a who followed the king to that war.

- 5 And now, when all was ready in advance, thinking that the time was then ripe for what he had long perversely planned,^b he began to consider how he might usurp divine honours. He wished, not only to be called,^c but to be believed to be the son of Jupiter, as if he could rule men's minds as well as their 6 tongues, and he ordered the Macedonians to pay their respects to him in the Persian fashion and to salute him by prostrating themselves on the ground. In his desire for such things he did not lack pernicious adulation, the constant evil of kings, whose power is more frequently overthrown by flattery than by foes.
7 And this was not the fault of the Macedonians—for none of them could endure to impair any jot of his native customs—but of the Greeks, who had debased their profession of the liberal arts^d by evil habits :—

opening Heaven to him, boasting that Hercules and Father Liber and Castor with Pollux would give place to the new deity.

- 9 Therefore on a festal day he ordered a banquet to be prepared with all magnificence, to which not only Macedonians and Greeks, the chief of his friends, but also nobles of the enemy were invited. When the king had taken his place at table with these, after 10 feasting for a little while he left the banquet. Cleo, as had been prearranged,^a began the conversation by expressing admiration for the king's glorious deeds. Then he enumerated their obligations to him; these, he said, could be requited in only one way, namely, since they knew that he was a god, by admitting it and paying for such great favours by the slight 11 expense of incense. The Persians indeed were not only loyal but also wise in worshipping their kings among the gods; for the majesty of the empire was the protector of its safety. Not even Hercules and Father Liber had been acknowledged as gods until they had overcome the jealousy^b of those who lived with them: future generations believed only so much about each man as his own time had vouched 12 for. But if the rest of the company were in doubt, he himself would prostrate himself on the ground when the king entered the banquet. The rest ought to do the same, and especially those endowed with wisdom; for it was by those that a precedent in worshipping the king ought to be shown.
 13 Quite clearly this speech was directed against Callisthenes. The austerity of the man and his ready freedom of speech were odious to the king, as if he alone were delaying the Macedonians, who were 14 prepared for such obsequiousness. He then, when

 15 odium by such flattery. But since he is not present, I am replying to you in his behalf that no fruit is at the same time both durable and prematurely ripened,^a and that you are not giving divine honours to your king, but taking them from him. For there is need of time for a man to be believed to be a god, and it is always thus that future generations requite great 16 men. But I pray for a late immortality for the king, in order that his life may be long and his majesty eternal. Divinity sometimes overtakes a man, it never accompanies him.
- 17 " You mentioned Hercules and Father Liber just now as examples of consecration to immortality. Do you believe that they were made gods by the decree of a single banquet ? Their mortal nature was removed from sight before Fame transported them

For my part, I admit that they are the victors if we accept from them the laws under which we live."

- 20 Callisthenes was heard with favourable ears ^a as a defender of the public liberty. He had forced, not only assent, but also words, especially of the older men, to whom the change of their long-standing
- 21 customs to those of strangers was distasteful. And the king was not unaware of anything that was said on one side and the other, since he was standing behind the curtains which he had caused to be spread round the couches. Therefore he sent word to Agis and Cleo to put an end to the discussion and to allow only the barbarians, when he entered, to prostrate themselves after their custom, and a little later, as if he had transacted some unusually important business,
- 22 he returned to the banquet. When the Persians paid reverence to him, Polypercon, who was reclining above the king, in mockery began to urge one of them, who touched the ground with his chin, to strike it harder against the earth, and thus aroused the anger of Alexander, which he had already been
- 23 unable to contain. Accordingly he said: "You, then, will not adore me? To you alone do we seem to be deserving of ridicule?" Polypercon replied that the king did not seem to deserve ridicule, nor he
- 24 himself contempt. Then the king dragged him from his couch, hurled him to the ground, and when he had fallen on his face, said: "Do you not see that you have done the same thing which a little while before you ridiculed in another?" And ordering that he should be put in prison, he broke up the banquet.

insubordination, his anger was more persistent. For 2 satisfying this an opportunity soon arose. It was the custom, as was said before,^a for the leading men of the Macedonians to entrust their sons to the king on their coming of age for duties not very different from 3 the services of slaves. They kept watch at night in turn close to the doors of the room in which the king slept. By these youths concubines were brought in by a different entrance from that before which the 4 armed guards were posted. They also received the horses from the grooms, brought them to the reigning king when he was about to mount, and accompanied him in the chase and in battle, besides being thoroughly trained in all the accomplishments of 5 liberal studies. The special honour was paid them of being allowed to sit at table with the king.^b No one had the power of chastising them by flogging 6 except the king himself. This troupe among the Macedonians was a kind of training-school^c for generals and governors of provinces; from these also their posterity had the kings from whose stock after many ages the Romans took away all power.

7 So then, Hermolaüs, a high-born boy belonging to this royal band, because he had been first to attack

- 9 ing a plot to kill the king. And they did not execute the plan with youthful impetuosity ; for they chose with care those whom they would admit as associates in the intended crime. They decided to include Nicostratus, Antipater, Asclepiodorus and Philotas ^a ; through these there were added Anticles and Aphtho-
- 10 nius and Epimenes. But for carrying out the plan no easy road at all lay open ; for it was necessary that all the conspirators should be on guard the same night, in order not to be interfered with by those who were not in the plot, but it happened that they
- 11 were on watch on different nights. Therefore in changing the order of guard-duty,^b and in other preparations for carrying out their design, thirty-two days were spent.
- 12 The night had come on which the conspirators were due to be on guard, rejoicing in their common fidelity, of which the lapse of so many days had been a proof. Not one had hope or fear changed ; so great among all was either their anger against the king or their
- 13 loyalty to one another. They were standing, then, at the door of the room in which the king was dining, in order to escort him to his bedchamber when he
- 14 had left the table. But his own good fortune, as well as the good company of the diners, led all to be lavish with their wine ; games at the banquet also extended the time, while the conspirators now rejoiced because they would attack him when sleepy, and now were anxious lest he should prolong the feast
- 15 until daylight. For others were due to take their places as guards at dawn, and their turn would not come again until after seven days, and they could not hope that the fidelity of all would endure until
- 16 that time. But when daylight was already at hand, the banquet came to an end and the conspirators received the king, rejoicing that the opportunity was offered for committing their crime, when a woman,^a of unsound mind, as it was thought, who was accustomed to haunt the royal quarters because she seemed by inspiration to foretell the future, not only met the king as he came out, but put herself in his way, and showing disturbance of mind in her face and eyes, warned him to return to the banquet.

17 He jestingly replied that the gods gave good advice, and recalling his friends, extended the time of the entertainment until nearly the second hour of the day.

18 Now the others of the troupe had taken over their posts, to watch before the door of the king's bedchamber, yet the conspirators remained there, although their turn of duty was completed ; so persistent is a hope which human minds have eagerly

19 conceived. The king, addressing them more kindly than usual, bade them go and rest themselves, since they had stood watch all night. He gave each man fifty sestertia and praised them because even after their turn had passed to others they had continued

20 on guard. And they, deprived of their great hope, went to their homes. The others for their part waited for the night of their guard-duty ; Epimenes, either because of the affability with which the king had received him along with the other conspirators, or because he believed that the gods opposed their design, had a sudden change of heart and disclosed the plan to his brother Eurylochus,^b whom before

21 he had wished to have no part in the plot. All had the torture of Philotas before their eyes, and so Eurylochus at once took his brother by the hand and came into the royal quarters, then having aroused the body-guard, he declared that what he had to say 22 concerned the king's life. Both the time at which he had come and the anxious expression of both brothers, betraying surely a troubled mind, as well as the sadness of one of them, alarmed Ptolemy and Leonnatus, who were on watch at the door of the king's bedchamber. Therefore opening the doors and bringing in a light, they awoke the king whom wine had buried ^a in deep sleep. He gradually collected his thoughts and asked them what they had to 23 say. Without delay Eurylochus said that the gods had not entirely ^b turned against their family, since his brother, although he had dared an impious crime, yet repented of it ^c and through himself rather than anyone else would reveal it; that the conspiracy had been planned for that very night which was passing, the ringleaders of the abominable design were those 24 whom the king would least suspect. Then Epimenēs explained everything in order and gave the names of the participants. It is certain that Callisthenes was not named as taking part in the plot, ^d but it was said that he was accustomed to lend ready ears to the boys when they abused the king and criticized 25 his conduct. Some add that when Hermolaüs complained to him also that he had been flogged, Callisthenes had said that they ought to remember that they were now men; but whether that was said to console him for suffering lashes, or to excite the resentment of the youths, was uncertain.

once gave Eurylochus fifty talents and the rich estate of a certain Tiridates and restored his brother to him 27 even before he begged for his life, but the authors of the crime, and among them Callisthenes, he ordered to be kept in fetters. When these had been brought into the royal quarters, since he was wearied by wine and loss of sleep he rested all day and the following 28 night. But on the next day he called a general assembly, at which the fathers and relatives of those concerned were present, who were not without anxiety even for their own lives, for according to the law of the Macedonians ^a they were doomed to die, since the lives of all were forfeit who were related by 29 blood to the guilty parties. The king ordered the conspirators except Callisthenes to be brought in, and without hesitation they confessed what they had 30 planned. Then, when all cried out against them, the king himself asked what he had done to deserve the plotting ^b of such a crime against him.

VII. The rest were struck dumb, but Hermolaüs said : “ We verily, since you ask as if you did not know, made a plot to kill you because you have begun, not to rule us as free men, but to lord it over us as if 2 we were slaves.” First of all his own father Sopolis, ^c crying out that he was also the murderer of his parent, arose and putting his hand over his son’s mouth, declared that one who was crazed by his crime and his misfortunes ought not to have a further hearing.

- 7 Thereupon all cried out at Hermolaüs, his father had drawn his sword against him and beyond doubt would have slain him if he had not been prevented by the king; he, however, ordered Hermolaüs to continue, and asked that they should hear with patience one who was adding to the reasons for his punishment.

guilty parties, and I guarantee that they will all 19 hold the same rank that they had before. Now as to your Callisthenes, to whom alone you seem to be a man because you are an assassin, I know why you wish him to be given audience; it is that in the presence of this company those reproaches which you have sometimes hurled at me and sometimes heard may be repeated from his lips. If he were a Macedonian, I should have presented him along with you, a master most worthy of such a pupil; as it is, being an Olynthian, he has not the same privilege." ^a 20 After these words he dismissed the assembly, and ordered those who had been condemned to be handed over to the men who belonged to the same cohort.
 They put them to death with torments, in order by 21 cruelty to show their loyalty to the king. Callisthenes ^b also expired in torture, although he was guiltless of forming any design against the king's life; but he was by no means suited to a court and to the character 22 of flatterers. Therefore there was no one whose death roused greater hatred of the king among the Greeks, because he had not only put to death a man endowed with noble character and accomplishments, one who had called him back to life when he had resolved to die after the death of Clitus, but had 23 even tortured him, and that without a trial. This act of cruelty, when it was too late, was followed by repentance.

parts which receive the south wind rise to a higher level of ground ; the rest of the country is flat and allows a quiet course through plains to many famous 4 rivers rising in Mount Caucasus.^a The Indus is colder than the rest ; it carries waters which do not 5 differ much from the sea in colour. The Ganges, greatest of all the rivers of the Orient, flows towards the south and in a straight channel grazes the great 6 mountain ranges. Then rocks in its course deflect it towards the east. Both rivers flow into the Red Sea.^b The Indus carries away its banks along with many 7 trees and a great part of the soil, and is also checked by rocks, from which it often rebounds ; where it finds a softer soil it is quiet, and forms islands. The 8 Acesines^c increases it. The Ganges intercepts the Iomanes^d in its downward course, and the two unite with a great commotion of their waters ; for the Ganges opposes a rough mouth to the inflowing river and the waters which are hurled back do not yield.

rivers ^a besides these, but they are unknown to fame, because they flow through regions unapproached as yet by us.

- 12 But the parts which are nearer the sea are greatly parched by the north wind ; this is checked by the mountain ranges and does not penetrate into the interior, which in consequence is mild for bearing 13 fruits. But in that quarter the earth so varies the established order of the seasons that when other places are burning with the heat of the sun, snows bury India, and on the other hand, when other places are stiff with frost, intolerable heat prevails there. Nor is there any reason why Nature should have changed her 14 course. Certainly the sea by which India is washed does not differ even in colour from other seas. Its name was given it from King Erythrus ^b ; for which reason the ignorant believe that its waters are red.
15 The land is rich in flax ^c ; hence the greater number of the people wear garments. The bark of the trees is tender and can receive writing just as papyrus

- 20 There, as everywhere, so also with them, the situation of the country affects the character of the men.
- 21 They veil their bodies in linen robes as far as the feet, clothe their feet in sandals, bind their heads in linen, and precious stones hang from their ears ; those who are eminent among the people for high birth or wealth adorn their wrists also and arms with gold.
- 22 They comb their hair more frequently than they shear it ; the chin is always unshorn, the rest of the skin of the face they shave close, so that it appears
- 23 smooth. Nevertheless the luxury of their kings, which they themselves call magnificence, surpasses the vices of all other nations. When the king allows himself to be seen in public, his attendants carry before him silver pans of incense, and fill with perfumes the whole road over which he has decided to be
- 24 borne. He reclines in a golden litter adorned with pearls hanging on every side ; the linen ^b robe which he wears is embroidered with gold and purple ; his litter is followed by armed men and by his body-guard,
- 25 among whom ^c on branches of trees birds perch, which they have trained by song to divert him from
- 26 serious affairs. His palace has gilded columns ; over all of these runs a vine carved in gold, and silver figures of birds, in the sight of which they take the greatest pleasure, adorn the structure.
- 27 The palace is open to all comers, when the king is having his hair combed and adorned ; it is then that he gives replies to deputations, then that he administers justice to his countrymen. When his sandals are taken off, his feet are bathed in perfumes.
- 28 His favourite exercise is the chase, which consists in - shooting with arrows animals shut up in a preserve, amid the prayers ^a and songs of his concubines. The arrows are two cubits in length, and they discharge them with more effort than effect ^b; for a weapon whose whole power depends upon lightness is burdened by its unsuitable weight.^c Shorter journeys he makes on horseback; when he undertakes a longer expedition, he rides in a chariot drawn by elephants, and the entire bodies of such huge brutes are covered with gold. Also, that nothing may be lacking in his abandoned habits, a long line of concubines follows in golden litters; this train is separated from that of the queen, but equals it in luxury.

- 30 Women prepare his food. They also serve his wine, the use of which is lavish with all the Indian peoples. When the king is overcome by wine and drowsiness, concubines take him to his chamber, invoking the gods of the night ^d in a song, after the custom of the country.
- 31 Who would believe that amid such vices there would be regard for philosophy? There is one rude and hideous class which they call sages.^e These consider it glorious to anticipate the day of fate,^f and those whose life is feeble or whose health is impaired give orders to be burned alive; to wait for death they regard as a disgrace to life, and no honour is paid to the bodies of those who die of old age; they believe that the fire ^g is sullied unless it receives
- 33 them while still breathing. Those who pass their lives in public services in the city are said skilfully to study the courses of the stars and to predict future regard as gods whatever they have begun to care for, especially trees, the violation of which is a capital 35 offence. They have divided the months into periods of fifteen days,^b but the full duration of the year is 36 observed.^c They reckon time by the course of the moon, not, as most do, when it has filled its orb, but when it has begun to curve into horns, and therefore they have shorter months, because they reckon their 37 duration according to that phase of the moon. Also many other things are related, for which there did not seem to be time ^d to delay the course of our history.

X. So, then, when Alexander had entered the bounds of India,^e the petty kings of the neighbouring races met him intending to submit to him, saying^f that he was the third son of Jupiter who had arrived in their land; that Father Liber and Hercules were known to them only by repute, but that Alexander 2 was present among them and was seen. The king received them courteously and bade them follow him, intending to use them as guides for his routes.
 But when no one else presented himself, he sent on Hephaestion and Perdiccas ^g with a part of his forces to subdue those who rejected his rule, and ordered them to proceed to the Indus River and make boats by which his army could be transported to places through the Cabul valley (Arr. iv. 22. 3-4). Fines Indiae mountain range which separates Iran from India as a part

 to whom many of his older historians belonged.

3 farther on. Those men, because several other rivers a way that they could be taken apart and carried on 4 wagons and again joined together. He himself after having directed Craterus to follow with the phalanx led out the cavalry and the light-armed 5 opposed him into the nearest city.^b And now Craterus had arrived ; and so, in order in the beginning to strike with terror a nation which had not yet experienced the arms of the Macedonians, the king ordered him to spare no one, having set fire to the 6 fortifications of the city which he was besieging. But while Alexander was riding up to the walls he was struck by an arrow. Nevertheless he took the town, and having butchered all its inhabitants, even vented his anger on its buildings.^c

7 Next, after subduing this unknown people, he came to the city of Nysa. It chanced that when he had pitched a camp before the very walls in a wooded place, a coldness severer than they had experienced at any other time^d chilled their bodies, and fire offered 8 a convenient remedy. Therefore they cut down trees and raised a flame, which, fed by logs, caught the sepulchres of the inhabitants. These had been built of old cedar, and widely spread the fire which had been started, until all were levelled with the 9 ground. And from the city first the barking of dogs, then the noise of men was heard. Then the townspeople knew that the enemy had come, and the Macedonians themselves, that they had reached the whelmed by weapons. In consequence some favoured surrender, others the trial of battle.

- When their hesitation became known, Alexander directed that they should merely be beleaguered and 11 not killed, and at last, exhausted by the hardships of a siege, they gave themselves up. They said that they had been founded by Father Liber ; and this 12 was in fact their origin. The city is situated at the foot of a mountain which the natives call Meros ^a ; from this the Greeks took the liberty of inventing the fable ^b that Father Liber had been hidden in the 13 thigh of Jupiter. Alexander, having learned from the natives the situation of the mountain, had supplies sent in advance, and ascended to its summit ^c with his whole army. Ivy and vines in abundance grow all over the height, and many perennial springs 14 gush forth. There are also fruits of a varied and wholesome flavour, since the earth without cultivation produces crops from the seeds that chance to fall there. Laurel, box, and myrtle form a natural grove 15 on those rocks. Carried away, as I for my part believe, not by divine inspiration but by a spirit of playfulness, they plucked the foliage of the ivy and the vines everywhere, and wreathed with garlands made from the leaves, wandered here and there through the whole grove like so many bacchantes.
 16 Hence the mountain heights and valleys rang with the shouts of so many thousands, as they invoked the god who presided over that grove, since as soon as this wantonness was begun by a few, as commonly happens it quickly spread to the whole company.
 17 In fact, as if they were in full enjoyment of peace, they threw themselves on the grass and the leaves

- 18 Bacchus.^a Who would deny that distinguished glory also is more often the gift of Fortune than of merit? For the enemy did not venture to attack them even while they were feasting or in a drunken sleep, being as greatly terrified by the noise of their rioting and howling as if they had heard the shouts of men going to battle. The same good fortune on their return from the Ocean protected them in their drunken revelry before the faces of their enemies.^b
- 19 From here they came to the region which is called Daedala.^c The inhabitants had deserted their homes and had fled to the inaccessible and forest-covered mountains. Accordingly the king passed by Acadira,^d which was equally abandoned and deserted by the

- 23 Cleophis ruled the city and the region. The city was garrisoned by 38,000 infantry ^a and was fortified, not only by its situation, but also by art. For where it looks towards the east it is girt by a very rapid river, which, having precipitous banks on both sides, makes
- 24 approach to the city difficult. Towards the west and the south Nature, as if by design, has thrown up towering crags, below which lie caverns and abysses which have been deeply hollowed by long lapse of time, and where these are lacking ditches have been
- 25 interposed with enormous labour. The city is surrounded by a wall of thirty-five stadia, the lower part of which is constructed of stone, the upper part of sun-dried brick. The brick work is so bound together by stones which they have interposed and at the same time by earth soaked in water, that the weaker part
- 26 rests on a stronger material. Nevertheless, in order that the whole structure might not settle, strong beams were placed upon it, on which galleries were raised, which both protected the walls and at the same time afforded a passage through them.
- 27 As Alexander was reconnoitring these fortifications and was uncertain what to do, since he could not fill up the caverns except by a mound, nor move up his siege-engines to the walls in any other way, someone from the wall shot at him with an arrow, and, as it happened, the weapon struck him in the
- 28 calf of his leg. When the barb had been pulled out he ordered a horse to be brought and riding upon it, without even binding up the wound, he continued no less vigorously to carry on what he had undertaken.
- 29 But since the wounded leg hung down, and when the blood dried the stiffening of the wound aggravated the pain, he is reported to have said ^b that he was indeed called the son of Jupiter, but that he felt the 30 effects of an ailing body. Yet he did not return to the camp until he had carefully examined everything and had ordered what he wished to be done. Accordingly, just as had been commanded, some were demolishing the houses outside the city and were bringing a great amount of timber for making the mound; others were throwing trunks of great trees, with their branches, and masses of stone into the 31 caverns. And already the mound had risen to the level of the surface of the ground; therefore they erected towers, and such was the ardour of the soldiers that these tasks were finished within the ninth day.

To inspect these works the king went out before a scab had covered his wound, and after praising the soldiers he ordered them to push forward the siege-engines, from which a mighty mass of weapons was 32 poured upon the defenders. The movable towers especially terrified men who were unacquainted with such devices, and they believed that such massive structures, aided by no visible power, were moved by the will of the gods; the mural pikes also, and the heavy spears hurled by the engines, they said 33 were not compatible with mortal power. Therefore, despairing of defending the city, they withdrew to the citadel. From there, because nothing but surrender was open to the besieged, envoys came down 34 to the king to ask for pardon. When this was granted, the queen came with a great train of noble ladies, making libations of wine from golden cups.
 35 She herself, placing her little son at the king's knees, obtained, not only pardon, but also the splendour of her former fortune; indeed, she was addressed as 36 also it is certain that a son who was born to her, whoever his father was, was called Alexander.^b

XI. Then Polypercon, who had been sent to the city of Hora ^c with an army, defeated the townsmen in a battle when they made a disorderly sortie ; having driven them within their fortifications, he followed 2 and reduced the city to subjection. Many obscure towns, which had been deserted by their inhabitants, came into the power of the king. The inhabitants of these armed themselves and occupied a crag called Aornus. That this had been beset by Hercules without success and that he had been compelled by an earthquake to abandon the attempt was a widespread 3 report.^d When Alexander was at a loss, because the rock was steep and abrupt on all sides, an old man who was acquainted with the neighbourhood came to him with two sons, promising that if it were made 4 worth his while he would show him a way up. Alexander agreed that he would give him eighty talents and having retained one of the young men as a hostage, sent the father to carry out what he had offered 5 to do. Myllinas,^e the king's secretary, was made the leader of a light-armed troop. For Alexander wished these to go to the summit by a circuitous route, in order to escape the notice of the enemy.
 6 The rock did not, like many others, rise by moderate and gentle slopes to a lofty summit, but elevated itself very much in the manner of a turning-block, of which the lower parts are wider, but become narrower as they rise higher and force the highest parts into

7 a sharp point. The Indus River comes close up to its base, and is very deep with steep banks on both sides; on the other side there are deep abysses and chasms.^a There was no other way open for storming the place 8 except by filling these. There was a forest at hand; this the king ordered to be cut in such a way that the tree-trunks should lie stripped of their limbs; for the branches covered with leaves would have hampered those who carried them. Alexander himself trimmed and threw in the first tree, and the army's shouting which followed was an indication of their eagerness, since no one shirked the task in which the 9 king had taken the lead. In this way before the seventh day they had wholly filled the caverns, when the king ordered the archers and the Agriani to try to mount the heights. Also he chose thirty of the 10 most active men of his own cohort.^b As leaders he gave them Charus and Alexander, and the king exhorted the latter to remember the name which he had in common with himself. And at first, because the danger was so evident, the king himself decided 11 not to run the risk, but when the signal was given by the trumpet, that prince of ready daring, turning to his guards, ordered them to follow him, and was the first to climb upon the rock. Then not one of the Macedonians stayed behind, but leaving their posts 12 of their own accord, they followed the king. Many met a wretched death, for they slipped from the steep rock, and the river which flowed by swallowed them up, a sad sight even for those who were not at the moment in danger; but when by the death of others they were reminded what they themselves had to fear, compassion changing to dread, they lamented, not the dead, but themselves.

- 13 And now they had gone so far that except as victors, they could not return without destruction, since the barbarians were rolling down huge stones upon them as they went up, and when struck by these while their footing was unsteady and slipping, 14 they fell back headlong. Nevertheless Alexander and Charus, whom the king had sent ahead with thirty selected men, had gained the height and were already fighting hand to hand ; but since the barbarians showered javelins upon them from above, they themselves were wounded more often than they 15 inflicted wounds. Therefore Alexander,^a remembering his name and his promise, while fighting more fearlessly than cautiously, was struck from every side 16 and overwhelmed. When Charus saw him lying prostrate, unmindful of everything except revenge he began to rush upon the enemy and killed many with his lance, some with his sword ; but when so many assailed one man, he fell lifeless upon the body 17 of his friend. The king, troubled as was natural by the death of these most valiant young men and of the 18 rest of his soldiers, gave the signal for retreat. They saved themselves by withdrawing gradually and unterrified, and the barbarians, content with having dislodged the enemy, did not follow them up as they 19 gave ground. But although Alexander had decided to abandon the attempt ^b—for no hope was offered of getting possession of the rock—yet he made a show of persisting in the siege. For he ordered the roads to be beset, and the towers to be advanced, and others to take the place of the wearied.
- 20 When his persistence was known, the Indi feasted for two days and two nights with a display, not only of confidence, but even of victory, beating drums

21 according to their custom; but on the third night the noise of the drums had ceased to be heard, but from the whole rock torches gleamed, which the barbarians had lighted in order that their flight might be safer, since they would have to run over pathless rocks 22 in the darkness of night. The king, having sent Balacrus ^a to reconnoitre, learned that the rock was deserted and the Indi in flight. Then, when the signal had been given for all to raise a shout, he struck 23 fear into them as they fled in disorder; and many, as if the enemy were at hand, were killed by throwing themselves over the slippery stones and pathless crags, still more, disabled in some part of their limbs, 24 were deserted by those who escaped injury. The king, although victor rather over the locality than over the enemy, yet made the show of a great triumph by sacrifices and worship of the gods. Altars to

He was son and successor of Taxiles.

Erices, who was in flight, killed him, and bore his head and armour to Alexander. He granted impunity to the deed, but refused any honour to the example.

- 4 From here he came on the sixteenth day to the river Indus, and found, as he had directed,^a that everything had been prepared by Hephaestion for crossing it. In that region Omphis was king,^b who had induced his father also to surrender his kingdom
5 to Alexander and after the death of his parent had sent envoys to ask Alexander whether he wished him to reign in the interim, or as a private citizen to await 6 his coming. But although he was allowed to be king, he nevertheless did not have the courage to use the privilege which was granted him. He indeed had received Hephaestion courteously, had measured out grain free of charge to his troops, yet had not met him, fearing to test the good faith of anyone except 7 the king. And so, when Alexander was coming near, he went out to meet him with his army equipped for action, in which he had also at moderate intervals between the companies of soldiers placed elephants, which at a distance gave the appearance of castles.
8 And Alexander at first thought that not an ally but an enemy was coming, and he also had already ordered his soldiers to take arms and the cavalry to withdraw to the wings, and was prepared for battle.

But the Indian, perceiving the mistake of the Macedonians, ordered the rest of his force to halt and himself put spurs to the horse which he was riding; Alexander did the same, whether he came as an enemy or a friend feeling safe either through his own 9 valour or the prince's good faith. They met, as could be judged from the expression of each, in a

- 12 When Alexander inquired whether he had more field-labourers or soldiers, Omphis replied that since he was at war with two kings, he needed a greater
- 13 force of soldiers than of farmers. These kings were Abisares and Porus,^b but Porus was the more powerful. Both reigned beyond the river Hydaspes,^c and they had decided to try the fortune of war against
- 14 anyone who attacked them. Omphis with the permission of Alexander assumed the royal diadem, and according to the usage of his race took the name which his father had had; the people called him Taxiles, a name which went with the sovereignty
- 15 of whoever succeeded to it. Having then entertained Alexander as his guest for three days, on the fourth day he both made known how much grain he had furnished to the forces which Hephaestion had brought,^d and gave golden crowns to Alexander

- and to all his friends, and besides these eighty talents 16 of coined silver ^a as a gift. Alexander, wonderfully pleased by his generosity, both returned what he had given and added 1000 talents from the booty which he was carrying, besides many gold and silver vessels for use at table, a quantity of Persian robes, and thirty of his own horses with the same trappings to which they were accustomed when he himself rode them.
- 17 This liberality, although it put the barbarian under an obligation, yet seriously offended the king's friends. ^b One of them, Meleager, having indulged too freely in wine, said at table that he congratulated Alexander that at least in India he had found a man 18 deserving of 1000 talents. The king, not forgetting how deeply he had regretted having killed Clitus because of his rash language, restrained his anger, but said that jealous men were nothing less than self-tormentors.

XIII. On the following day envoys ^c of Abisares came to the king. They, according to their orders, surrendered everything into his power; and having given and received a pledge of good faith, they were 2 sent back to their king. Thinking that Porus also could be forced to surrender by the fame of his name, Alexander sent Cleochares to him to demand that he should pay tribute and meet Alexander at the frontier of his territories. Porus replied that he would comply with the second of these demands, that he would be on hand when Alexander entered his realm, but it 3 would be in arms. Alexander had already decided to cross the Hydaspes River, when Barzaentes, ^d the instigator of the revolt of the Arachosii, was brought to him in fetters, as well as thirty elephants which had been captured at the same time with him, a timely aid against the Indi; for they had more hope and strength in those beasts than in their army.

4 Damaraxus also, the king of a small district of India, who had allied himself with Barzaentes, was brought 5 to Alexander in fetters. Accordingly, when the deserter and the prince had been put under guard and the elephants given to Taxiles, Alexander came to the river Hydaspes, on whose farther bank Porus had taken position, intending to prevent the enemy 6 from crossing. Porus had put in front eighty-five elephants of extraordinary strength of body, and behind these 300 chariots and about 30,000 foot-soldiers, among whom were archers with heavier arrows, as was said before, than they could shoot to advantage.

7 Porus himself was mounted upon an elephant towering above the rest of the brutes, and armour decorated with gold and silver adorned a body of unusual stature.^a His courage was equal to his strength of body, and his wisdom was as great as 8 could be found among uncultivated folk. Not merely the appearance of the enemy, but also the size ^b of the river that must be crossed terrified the Macedonians. Extending to a width of four stadia, with a deep channel which nowhere disclosed a ford, it gave 9 the impression of a vast sea. And it did not check its swift course in proportion to the extent of its widely spread waters,^c but as if confined by its banks to a narrow channel, it rushed on in a foaming torrent, and rebounding billows revealed hidden 10 rocks in many places. Still more formidable was the appearance of the bank, which had been filled with horses and men. There stood huge masses of vast bodies,^d and when they were purposely irritated they

- 11 wearied the ears with their hideous trumpeting. On one hand the river, on the other the enemy had nevertheless struck unlooked-for terror into breasts which were indeed capable of good hope and had surely often seen such hope realized. For they thought that the unsteady^a boats could not be steered to the bank nor landed there in safety.
- 12 There were in midstream numerous islands, to which both the Indi and the Macedonians crossed by swimming, raising their weapons over their heads. There light skirmishing took place, and both kings by the decision of these small contests were testing
- 13 the outcome of the main struggle. Now there were in the army of the Macedonians Hegesimachus and Nicanor, high-born youths conspicuous for rashness and daring, aroused by the constant good fortune of
- 14 their side^b to despise all dangers; under their lead the most active of the young men, armed only with lances, swam across to an island which a crowd of the enemy held and, armed with nothing better than
- 15 daring, slew many of the Indi. They might have come off with glory if successful rashness were ever capable of moderation; but while they were awaiting contemptuously and even haughtily those who were coming against them, they were surrounded by those who had secretly swum out and were overwhelmed
- 16 by weapons hurled at long range. Those who had escaped the enemy were swept away by the force of the river or swallowed up in the whirlpools. And this battle greatly increased the confidence of Porus, who saw the whole event from the bank.
- 17 Alexander, uncertain what to do, finally devised the following stratagem^c to deceive the enemy. There was an island^d in the river larger than the - rest, wooded also and suitable for concealing an ambuscade, moreover in a very deep ditch not far from the bank which he himself held he could conceal not only foot-soldiers but even men and their horses;

- 18 therefore, in order to distract the enemy's attention from guarding against this advantageous place, he ordered Ptolemy^a with all his cavalry to ride to a point far from that island, and from time to time to alarm the Indi by shouts, as if they were going to
- 19 swim across the river. For many days Ptolemy did this, and by this device compelled Porus also to turn his army to that part at which he pretended to be aiming. Already the island was out of the enemy's
- 20 sight. Alexander ordered his tent to be pitched on a different part of the bank, and the cohort which usually attended him to stand before that tent and all the equipment of royal magnificence to be purposely
- 21 displayed before the eyes of the foe. Attalus^b also, of the same age as himself and not unlike him in face and figure, especially when he was seen from a distance, he adorned with the royal robe, in order to give the impression that the king himself was encamped on that part of the bank and was not thinking of crossing.
- 22 The carrying out of this plan was first delayed then furthered by a storm, since Fortune turned even
- 23 obstacles to good results. He was preparing to cross the river with the rest^c of his forces to the shore near the island of which mention was made before, having diverted the attention of the enemy against those who, with Ptolemy, had occupied a part of the bank farther down the river, when a tempest poured out rain which was scarcely to be endured by people, storm, fled back to the land, deserting the boats and the rafts, but the uproar made by the bustling men was drowned^a by the noisy gusts of wind and could not be heard by the enemy. Then in a moment the rain ceased,^b but such thick clouds overspread the sky that they hid the light, and men who were talking together 25 could scarcely recognize each other's faces. The night that darkened the sky would have terrified anyone else, since it was necessary to sail upon an unknown river, when perhaps the enemy were holding that very bank at which they were blindly and recklessly 26 aiming. But the king, inviting glory by courting danger, and thinking that the obscurity which terrified the rest was his opportunity, having given the signal for all silently to embark in the boats, ordered the one in which he himself was carried to be 27 pushed off first. The bank at which they aimed was deserted^c by the enemy; for Porus was still watching Ptolemy only. Therefore only one boat, which a wave had dashed upon a rock, was stranded; the rest reached their goal, and Alexander ordered his soldiers to arm themselves and take their places in the ranks.

XIV. And now the army had formed its wings and the king himself was leading it, when it was announced to Porus that the bank was held by armed men and that a dangerous moment was at hand. And at first, by that defect of the human mind which indulges wishful thinking, he believed that Abisares, his ally in the war, was coming,^d for so it 2 had been agreed. But presently, as the light grew clearer and revealed the enemy's battle line, Porus sent 100 four-horse chariots and 4000 horsemen to oppose the advancing column. The leader of the troops which he sent was Spitaces, his brother,^a and the greater part of his strength was in his chariots ; 3 each of these carried six men, two with bucklers, two archers stationed on each side, the rest were the drivers, who were by no means unarmed ; for when it was necessary to fight hand to hand, they dropped the reins and poured a shower of javelins upon the enemy.

 4 However, on that day this aid was of hardly any use ; for, as was said above, the rain which had fallen with greater violence than usual had made the plains slippery and unfit for riding, and the heavy and almost immovable chariots stuck fast in the muck and 5 mudholes. On the other hand, Alexander with his unencumbered and light-armed force charged them vigorously. The Scythians and the Dahae first of all attacked the Indi ; then Alexander sent Perdiccas ^b with the cavalry against the right wing of the enemy.
 6 And already the battle had begun ^c everywhere, when those who drove the chariots, thinking it the last possible aid for their side, began to rush with loose 7 rein into the midst of the contest. This was a common evil for both sides. For the foot-soldiers of the Macedonians were trampled at the first attack, and the chariots sent over the slippery and impassable ground 8 shook off those who guided them. The frightened horses of others dragged the chariots not only into 9 the mudholes and pools, but even into the river, a few, driven by the enemy's weapons, made their way to Porus, who was vigorously urging on the fight. He, when he saw the chariots wandering all over the field without drivers, distributed ^d the elephants to 10 those of his friends who were nearest to him. Behind

^c According to Arrian (v. 19. 1), it was " over five cubits "

- these he had stationed the infantry and the archers, as well as those who were accustomed to beat the drums; this with the Indi took the place of the sound of trumpets, and the elephants were not terrified by the noise, since their ears had been long since trained
- 11 to the familiar sound. A statue of Hercules ^a was carried at the head of the infantry force; this was a very great incentive to the combatants, and to have abandoned those who were carrying it was held
- 12 to be a military disgrace. They even decreed the penalty of death to those who should not bring it back from the field of battle, since the fear which they had once felt of that enemy had been changed even to adoration and veneration. The Macedonians were checked for a time, by the sight not only of the elephants but of the king himself.
- 13 The beasts, stationed ^b between lines of armed men, at a distance looked like towers, while Porus himself had almost exceeded the measure of human stature ^c; the beast on which he rode seemed to add to his height, since it rose as much higher than the other elephants as he did above the rest of his men.
- 14 Accordingly Alexander, contemplating both the king and the army of the Indi, said: "At last I behold a danger worthy of my spirit; I am dealing at the same time with beasts and with remarkable
- 15 men." Then, looking at Coenus, he said: "When I, attended by Ptolemy, Perdikkas, and Hephaestion, have made a charge against the left wing of the enemy and you see me in the thick of the brunt of battle, do you move to the right wing and attack the enemy while they are in disorder. - 16 Our spears, which are very long and strong, will never serve us better than against these beasts and their drivers; bring down those who are mounted on them and stab the brutes. It is a doubtful kind of strength, and rages more violently against its own men; for it is driven against the enemy by command, against its own men by fear."
- 17 Having said this, he was the first to put spurs to his horse. And already, as had been planned, he had plunged into the ranks of the enemy, when Coenus
- 18 with mighty force charged the left wing.^a The phalanx too at the first onset burst through the middle of the line of the Indi. But Porus, where he saw that the cavalry were charging, ordered the elephants to be advanced, but that animal, being slow and well-nigh immovable, could not equal the
- 19 speed of the horses. The barbarians too could make no use of their arrows. For since these were long and very heavy, they could not safely and conveniently fit them to the bow^b unless they first rested its end upon the earth, and as the ground was slippery and therefore interfered with attempting this, by the time they were ready to take aim they were overtaken
- 20 by the speed of the enemy. Therefore, disregarding^c the king's order—which generally happens when it is fear rather than a leader that begins to issue the sharper commands to men who are in great confusion—there were as many commanders as there were
- 21 scattered bands; one was giving orders to unite the line of battle, another to divide it, some to stand fast, and others to envelop the enemy from behind;

- ever, with a few over whom shame had more power than fear, proceeded to collect his scattered forces and to advance against the foe, giving orders that the elephants be put in front of his line of troops.^a
- 23 The brutes caused great terror, and their trumpeting not only threw into confusion the horses, animals so fearful of everything, but also the men and the ranks.
- 24 And already those who shortly before were victors were looking about for an opportunity for flight, when Alexander sent against the elephants the light-armed Agriani and the other Thracians, troops
- 25 better in a rapid attack^b than in close combat. These cast a great shower of weapons both upon the elephants and upon those who were guiding them. The phalanx also began steadily to attack the terrified
- 26 animals. But some, who pursued the elephants too eagerly, so irritated them by wounds that they turned upon them. Hence, being trampled under foot,^c they served to the rest as a lesson to attack
- 27 with greater caution. It was a particularly awful spectacle when with their trunks they seized men and their weapons and passed them over their heads to
- 28 the drivers. As a result, the shifting battle, as they now pursued and now fled from the elephants, prolonged the undecided contest until late in the day, when with axes—for that kind of help had been prepared beforehand—they began to cut off their feet.
- 29 With slightly curved swords, like sickles, which they called copides, they attacked the brutes' trunks. And their fear left nothing untried, not only in dealing death, but also in new ways of making death itself painful.
- 30 Therefore the elephants, at last worn out by wounds, rushed upon and overthrew their own men, and those who had guided them were hurled to the ground and trampled to death by them. And now like cattle, more frightened than dangerous, they 31 were being driven off the field of battle, when Porus, abandoned by very many of his followers,^a began from his own elephant to pour upon those who surrounded him many javelins which had been made ready in advance. And although he wounded many at long range, he himself was exposed to shots from every 32 side. He had already suffered nine wounds, now in his back, now in his breast, and had lost so much blood that his arms were weak and the weapons which he tried to throw rather fell from his hands 33 than were hurled with any force. His elephant too, roused to madness and not yet wounded, charged with no less vigour against the enemy's ranks, until the driver of the beast saw that the king had collapsed,^b had dropped his weapons, and was hardly 34 conscious. Then he urged the monster to flight, pursued by Alexander ; but the king's horse, which had been pierced by many shafts and was giving out, fell under him, rather dismounting him than throwing him off. And so, while he was changing his horse he 35 pursued more slowly. Meanwhile the brother of Taxiles, king of the Indi, being sent ahead by Alexander, began to advise Porus not to persist in resisting to the bitter end, but to surrender himself to the 36 victor. But he, although his strength was exhausted and he had lost much blood, nevertheless, aroused by the familiar voice, said : " I recognize the brother of Taxiles, the betrayer of his kingdom and his country," and hurled at him the only javelin which, as it happened, had not fallen from his hands ; and it passed through the middle of his breast and came

- 37 out at his back. After performing this last feat of valour Porus began to flee with greater speed. But the elephant also, which had received many spear-wounds, began to give out; hence Porus checked his flight and opposed the infantry to the pursuing enemy.
- 38 Already Alexander had come up with him and, perceiving Porus' obstinacy, ordered that no quarter be given to those who resisted. Therefore weapons were hurled from every side both upon the foot-soldiers and upon Porus himself, by which he was at last overwhelmed and began to slide off his beast.
- 39 The Indian who was managing the animal,^a thinking that the king was dismounting in the usual manner, ordered the elephant to kneel; when he did so, the rest of the animals also—for so they had been trained—let down their bodies to the ground. This action delivered Porus and the rest of his company to the
- 40 victors. The king, believing that Porus had been killed, ordered his body to be stripped of its armour, and men were running up to take off his cuirass and his robe, when the elephant began to protect^b his master, and to attack the spoilers, and lifting the king's body, to place it upon his back. Therefore the beast was overwhelmed with weapons from all sides, and when he had been killed Porus was placed in a chariot.
- 41 When the king saw him lifting his eyes, moved by pity, not by hatred, he said: "What the mischief^c was the madness which forced you, knowing the fame of my exploits, to try the fortune of war, when you had Taxiles, so near a neighbour, as an

 43 you." Being further asked how he thought the victor ought to treat him, he replied : " What this day advises you, on which you have learned how 44 perishable good fortune is." ^a Porus effected more by his admonition than if he had resorted to prayers ; for the greatness of his spirit, unterrified and unbroken even by misfortune, Alexander saw fit to treat, not merely with compassion, but even with 45 honour. He had the wounded man attended to as if he had fought for him. When, contrary to the expectation of all, he recovered, Alexander received him into the number of his friends, and presently gave him a kingdom greater than he had held before.^b 46 And truly there was no stronger and more consistent characteristic of his nature than admiration for true merit and glory ; yet he estimated fame more frankly in an enemy than in a fellow citizen. For he believed that by his own countrymen his greatness could be impaired, but that it would be the more illustrious the greater those had been whom he had conquered.

CONTENTS OF BOOK IX

Alexander advances to the Hypasis River; he subdues many nations and cities, whose manners and customs are described (i).

When he prepares to cross the Hypasis and attack two powerful nations, his soldiers show signs of weariness and reluctance to go farther. The king appeals to their devotion in an eloquent speech (ii).

Coenus replies to the king in the name of the soldiers. Alexander finally turns back after setting up twelve altars as a memorial of his expedition, and founding Nicaea and Bucephala. He prepares a fleet and sails down the Hypasis. Coenus falls ill and dies (iii).

Alexander subdues the Sibi. He suffers great peril at the confluence of the Hydaspes and the Acesines, but reaches the land of the Malli. The soldiers show renewed signs of disaffection, but a speech of the king rouses their enthusiasm. He defeats the barbarians, and in spite of the warning of a seer attacks their city (iv).

He leaps from the wall of the citadel into the midst of the enemy and, after fighting against great odds, is severely wounded but is rescued by members of his body-guard (v).

Before his wound is healed the king appears in public. His friends urge him to have more consideration for his own and the public safety. He expresses gratitude, but persists in his determination to conquer the whole world (vi).

Disturbances among the Greeks in Bactriana. Envoys from the Malli and the Sudracae offer submission. Alexander gives them a banquet, at which Dioxippus, an Athenian, and Corratas, a Macedonian, fight a duel. The Greek is victor, but kills himself because of the calumnies of his enemies (vii).

HISTORY OF ALEXANDER, IX

Alexander sails down the Indus to Patala and subdues the neighbouring tribes. Ptolemy is wounded by a poisoned arrow, and is miraculously cured (viii).

Alexander at last satisfies his longing to reach the Ocean, not without danger from the tides and the inexperience of his sailors (ix).

Leaving Nearchus to explore the Ocean with the fleet and come back by sea, Alexander returns through the great deserts of Cedrosia, where the army suffers greatly from hunger and disease. At length they reach Carmania and pass through it in a bacchanalian procession (x).

- I. ALEXANDER, rejoicing in so memorable a victory, by which he believed that the bounds of the Orient were opened to him, sacrificed victims to the Sun^a; then, in order that his soldiers also might meet the rest of the war with readier minds, he called an assembly, and after praising them informed them that whatever strength the Indi had possessed had 2 been overthrown in the recent battle; that hereafter there would be nothing but rich booty, and that world-renowned riches were conspicuous in that region to which they were on their way. Furthermore, he said that the spoils taken from^b the Persians were now cheap and shabby, that his hearers would fill, not only their homes, but all Macedonia and Greece with gems and pearls and gold and ivory.
- 3 The soldiers, being eager both for wealth and for glory, and at the same time because no assertion of his had ever disappointed them, engaged their service; and when they had been dismissed full of good hope, he ordered ships to be built, in order that, when they had overrun all Asia, they might visit the 4 world's end, the sea. There was an abundance of timber^c for ships in the neighbouring mountains, and when they began to attack it they found snakes of serpents,^a whose scales shone with the brilliance of gold. No poison is more dangerous; for instant death followed their bite unless an antidote was they came to the river Hyraotis.^c Close to the river was a shady grove, abounding in trees not seen else-moved his camp from there, Alexander took a nearby town by encirclement, and after receiving hostages imposed tribute upon it.

Next he came to a great city, for that region, protected not only by a wall but also by a marsh.^d 15 But the barbarians sallied forth to battle with chariots joined together; some were armed with lances, others with axes, and they leaped rapidly from chariot to chariot, when they wished to aid their men who 16 were under difficulties. And at first the unusual kind of battle terrified the Macedonians, when they were wounded from a distance; then, scorning such a rude array, they surrounded the chariots on both 17 sides and began to kill those who resisted. And Alexander gave orders that the bonds by which the chariots were held together should be cut, in order that one by one they might be more easily surrounded. And so the enemy, after losing 8000 of 18 their number, fled back to the town. On the following day ladders were planted on all sides and the walls were carried by assault. A few were saved by their swiftness, and when these, knowing of the destruction of the city, swam across the marsh, they struck great terror into the neighbouring towns by declaring that an invincible army, surely made up of gods, had come.

- 19 Alexander sent Perdicas with a light-armed band, to devastate that region, and delivered a part of the forces to Eumenes,^a in order that he also might force the barbarians to surrender ; Alexander himself led the rest to a strong city, in which the natives also of
- 20 other cities had taken refuge. The besieged sent envoys to beg the king for mercy, but nevertheless prepared for war. For a disagreement had arisen, which had divided the common people into divers opinions ; some thought anything preferable to surrender, others that they had no power in themselves.
- 21 But while they could not come to an agreement, those who were eager for surrender opened the gates and
- 22 let in the enemy. Alexander, although he might justly have been angry with those who advocated war, having nevertheless pardoned them all and received hostages, moved his camp from there to the
- 23 next city. The hostages were led at the head of the army ; when the inhabitants recognized them from the walls, since they were of the same nation they summoned them to a conference. The hostages by telling them of the king's clemency and at the same time of his power drove them to surrender ; and he subdued the rest of the cities in a similar manner and received them under his protection.

 27 that is what is valued in the children. A town of this nation, against which Alexander had moved his forces, was held by Sopithes himself. The gates were shut, but no armed men showed themselves on the walls and in the towers, and the Macedonians were in doubt whether the inhabitants had deserted the city or had hidden themselves treacherously; 28 when suddenly a gate was opened and the Indian king with two grown-up sons presented himself, a man far surpassing all other barbarians in physical vices began to pull away the leg of a dog that with the others was clinging to the lion, and then, because the animal did not let go, to cut the leg off with a 33 knife. When even then the dog's persistency was not overcome, he began to cut another part, and when the dog held fast with equal strength, to make cuts at the dog's body as well; but the dog even in dying kept his teeth fixed in the lion's wound. Such is the eagerness for the chase which Nature is 34 reported to have implanted in those animals. As for myself, I report more things than I believe; for I cannot bring myself to vouch for that about which I am in doubt, nor to suppress what I have heard.

 35 Alexander then, leaving Sopithes in his kingdom, advanced to the river Hypasis,^a joined by Hephaes-36 tion, who had subdued a different region. Phegeus^b was king of the next nation; he gave orders to his subjects to work in the fields as they had been accustomed and went on to meet Alexander, refusing nothing which he should order.

II. The king remained with Phegeus for two days. On the third day he had decided to pass over the river, which was difficult to pass, not only because of the extent of its waters, but also because it was encum-2 bered with rocks. Accordingly, having inquired of Phegeus what he needed to know, he learned that beyond the river there was a journey of twelve days through desert wastes and that then they came to 3 the Ganges, the greatest river of all India, and that on its farther bank dwelt the races called Gangaridae and Prasii; that their king was Aggrammes^c and that he was blocking the roads with 20,000 cavalry

4 and 200,000 infantry. Besides this, he was leading 2000 chariots, and, a special cause of terror, elephants, of which Phegeus said that he had as many as 3000.

5 All this seemed incredible to Alexander; therefore he asked Porus—for he was with him—whether 6 what was said was true. Porus assured him that the strength of the nation and of the kingdom was not exaggerated, but that the ruler was not only of humble, but of the lowest condition; in fact, his father, a barber whose daily profit barely kept him from starving, because he was not bad looking had 7 been beloved by the queen. By her he had been advanced to intimate friendship with the king who then reigned, and having treacherously killed him, had usurped the throne under the pretext of guardianship of the king's children; then, having murdered the children, he had begotten the present king, who was hated and despised by his subjects and mindful 8 rather of his father's fortune than of his own. Porus' declaration had filled the king's mind with varied anxiety. He scorned the enemy and his beasts, but dreaded the nature of the terrain and the violence of 9 the rivers; it seemed a hard task to follow up and dislodge ^a those who had been relegated almost to the utmost limit of the human race, on the other hand, his eager thirst ^b for glory and his insatiable longing for renown allowed nothing to seem inacces-10 sible, nothing remote. Also he doubted sometimes whether the Macedonians, after having traversed such an extent of country and grown old ^c in battle and in camp, would follow him over opposing rivers and through so many difficulties put in their way by nature; he feared that sated and loaded with booty they would prefer to enjoy what they had obtained

- 12 Therefore ambition prevailed over reason, and having called the soldiers together, he addressed them in about these terms : " I know well, soldiers, that many things which may well alarm you have been spread abroad with that intent by the peoples

17 And yet it is with the same untruthfulness that they have numbered their forces of infantry and cavalry.
 Indeed, the wider the extent of a river, the more quietly it flows ; for when restrained by banks that are close together, and hence dashed into a narrower channel, they carry torrential waters, and on the contrary their course is more sluggish in a spacious 18 channel. Besides this, all the danger is at the bank, where the enemy awaits us as we are landing our boats. Hence, however great the river that intervenes, the danger will be the same when we dis-19 embark on the land. But let us imagine that all those things are true ; do the great size of the beasts or the multitude of the enemy terrify us ? So far as the elephants are concerned, we have a recent experience before our eyes ; they rushed with greater fury against their own men than against us ; their bodies, great as they are, were mutilated by axes and 20 sickles. But what difference does it make whether they are as many as Porus had, or that there are 3000, when you have seen that after one or two are 21 wounded the rest are turned to flight ? Furthermore, they manage even a few elephants with difficulty and inconvenience ; but, when so many thousands are gathered together, they trample one another—where such huge and unwieldy masses of bodies have been able neither to stand nor to flee. For my part, I so despised those animals that after I had them,^a I did not make use of them against the enemy, knowing well enough that they inflicted more damage on their own side than on the enemy.

III. Not even thus could a word be forced from any of the soldiers. They were waiting for their generals and chief officers to bear the news to the king that, worn out by wounds and the unremitting toil of military service, they did not refuse their duties, but 2 were no longer able to endure them. But the generals, overwhelmed with fear, kept their eyes riveted on the ground.

Then first an involuntary murmur, then also groans were heard, and little by little sadness began to be shown more freely by such floods of tears that the king's anger was turned to compassion, and he himself, though he strove to do so, could not control his 3 eyes. At length, when the whole assembly was dissolved in tears, Coenus, while the rest hesitated, had ventured to approach nearer to the tribunal, 4 indicating that he desired to speak. When the soldiers saw him removing his helmet from his head—for so it is customary to address the king—they began to urge him to plead the cause of the army.
 5 Then Coenus said: "The gods forbid that we should have impious thoughts. And surely they do forbid it; the feelings of your soldiers are the same that they always have been, namely, to go wherever you order, to fight, to incur danger, at the price of our blood to

- lack everything. And we are not suffering because of luxury, but it is in war that we have used up the 12 equipment for war. Will you expose this most noble army naked to wild beasts? Of these, although the barbarians purposely exaggerate the multitude, yet even from their false report I know that the number 13 is great. But if you are still determined to penetrate farther into India, the southern part of that region is less immense; when that has been subdued, you may run down to that sea which Nature has decreed 14 should be the boundary of human affairs. Why do you seek glory by a long circuit when it lies at your hand? "Here too the Ocean meets you. Unless you prefer to wander about, we have reached 15 the place to which your fortune is leading you. I have preferred to say these things in your presence rather than to discuss them with the men in your absence, not with a view to gaining favour with the army here assembled, but that you might hear from my lips the voice of those who speak out rather than the groans of those who grumble."
- 16 When Coenus had ended his address, shouts arose from every side mingled with lamentations, as in a medley of voices they called out "king," "father" 17 and "lord." And now also the other generals, and especially the older ones, for whom because of their age it was both more honourable to ask for an excuse and whose authority was greater, gave 18 utterance to the same entreaties. Alexander found himself unable either to rebuke them for their obstinacy or to be appeased in his anger; therefore, being at a loss what to do, he leaped down from the tribunal, ordered the royal quarters to be closed, and all to be refused admission except his regular

^a Also in hope that the soldiers would change their minds. Diod. xvii. 94. 3-4 says that he offered the soldiers an opportunity to plunder the rich country on the river, and made presents to their wives and children.

^b Diodorus, Plutarch, and Justin agree with this. Arrian (v. 29. 1) says nothing of it, but speaks of the altars as of great size.

^c The Chenab. But in fact Alexander, having turned back at the Hypasis, marched as far as the Hydaspes; see p. 394, note a, Strabo xv. 1. 32, and Aristobulus in Strabo xv. 1. 17. Curtius' error is shared by Diodorus and Justin, who in

He also gave directions that the fortifications of the camp be extended, and couches of a larger size than were used by men of ordinary stature be left there, in order that by exaggerating the proportion of everything he might prepare a deceptive wonder for posterity.^b

20 From here he retraced the ground which he had covered and encamped near the river Acesines.^c There, as it chanced, Coenus was taken ill and died.^d The king was in fact grieved by his death, but could not forbear to remark that Coenus for the sake of a few days^e had begun a long harangue, as if he alone

21 were destined to see Macedonia again. Already the fleet which he had ordered to be built was afloat in the river.^f Meanwhile Memnon had brought from Thrace a reinforcement of 5000 horsemen, and besides these 7000 foot-soldiers from Harpalus, for 25,000 men

22 sets of armour inlaid with gold and silver. These Alexander distributed and ordered the old ones to be burned. Intending to make for the Ocean with a thousand ships,^g he left Porus and Taxiles, the Indian general follow the same sources as he. The Hypasis (Beas) and the Hydaspes (Sutlej) become one river in due course.

^a According to Arrian vi. 2. 1, Coenus died when Alexander had reached the Hydaspes and prepared his fleet.

^c The Hydaspes, not the Acesines. See Arr. vi. 1. 1, and for what Alexander did at the Acesines v. 29. 3.

^d According to Arrian vi. 2. 4, the number of ships and boats was nearly 2000, of which 80 had thirty oars each; so also Diod. xvii. 95. 5, who agrees with Curtius as to the whole number.

kings, who had been at odds and reviving old feuds, in friendly relations strengthened by an alliance by marriage, and established each in his own sovereignty because he had received the greatest service from 23 them in building his fleet. He also founded^a two towns, of which he called one Nicaea and the other Bucephala, dedicating the latter to the name and 24 memory of the horse which he had lost. Then, having given orders that the elephants and the baggage should follow by land,^b he sailed down the river, advancing about forty stadia each day, to allow the troops to be landed from time to time where there were convenient places.

IV. They had come into the country where the 2 Hydaspes unites with the Acesines. From there the river flows into the country of the Sibi.^c These people allege that their forefathers belonged to the army of Hercules^d; that being left behind on account of sickness, they had gained possession of the abode 3 in which their posterity were living. They dressed in the skins of wild beasts, their weapons were clubs, and they also showed many traces of their origin, although Greek customs had become obsolete.
 4 Having made a landing there, he went on for a distance of two hundred and fifty stadia, and after devastating the region, by an assault on all sides took 5 the town which was its capital. Another nation had opposed 40,000 foot-soldiers on the bank of the rivers^e; Alexander crossed the Acesines, drove them within their walls, and took their town by assault. Those of military age were put to death, the rest 6 were sold. Then, having attempted to storm a second city, but being repulsed by the great strength of its defenders, he lost many of the Macedonians. But when he had persisted in besieging it, the inhabitants, despairing of safety, set fire to their houses and burned to death in the flames themselves and their 7 wives and their children.^a Since they themselves were spreading the fire, while the enemy were trying to put it out, a novel kind of battle took place; the inhabitants were trying to destroy their city, the enemy were defending it. So completely does war invert even the laws of Nature.

8 The citadel of the town was unharmed, and in it Alexander left his sick as a garrison. He himself sailed around the fortress in his ships. For the three greatest rivers of all India except the Ganges protect its fortifications with their waters; on the north the Indus washes them, on the south the Acesines unites 9 with the Hydaspes. Moreover, the union of the rivers raises billows like those of the sea, and the abundance of turbid silt, which is constantly shifted by the confluent waters, compresses the way where it 10 is navigable by boats into a narrow channel. Therefore, since wave after wave met them, and struck now the prows and now the sides of the ships, the sailors began to furl^b the sails. But their efforts were thwarted, partly by the surging waves, partly 11 by the very rapid flow of the rivers. In the sight of all two of the greater ships were sunk; the lighter ones, although they also could not be managed, were nevertheless thrown out on the bank uninjured. The king himself was carried into the swiftest of the eddies, by which his ship was turned sidewise and 12 driven on without obeying its helm. Already he had taken off his clothing, intending to plunge into the river, and his friends were swimming near by ready to pick him up, and it appeared equally dangerous either to take to swimming or to persist 13 in sailing on; therefore they plied the oars with mighty rivalry, and did all that human power could do to break through the waves which dashed upon 14 them. You might have thought that the billows were cloven and that the surges were forced to retreat. When at last the ship was saved from these, it nevertheless could not be brought to the bank, but was dashed upon the nearest shoal. You would have thought that a war had been waged with the river. Accordingly, Alexander set up as many altars as there were streams, and having offered sacrifice, went on for thirty stadia.

15 ✓ From there he came into the land of the Sudracae ✓ and the Malli, who at other times were usually at war with each other, but then had united in the face of the common danger. They had 90,000 younger foot-soldiers,^a and besides these 10,000 horsemen 16 and 900 chariots. But when the Macedonians, who believed that they had already encountered every danger, knew that a fresh war with the most war-like nations of India^b still remained, they were struck with sudden fear, and began again to upbraid 17 the king with mutinous language: that after being compelled to cross the Ganges and the regions beyond it, they had nevertheless not ended, but only shifted, the war. They were exposed to unconquered nations in order that at the cost of their blood they might 18 open a way for him to the Ocean. They were being dragged beyond the constellations and the sun^c and forced to approach places which Nature had withdrawn from the sight of mortals.^d For their new arms new enemies constantly appeared. Granted that they routed and put to flight all these, what reward awaited them? Gloom and darkness, and perpetual night-brooding over an unplumbed sea, a deep teeming with schools of savage sea-monsters, stagnant waters in which expiring Nature had met her end.

- 19 The king, disturbed by anxiety, not for himself but for his soldiers, having called an assembly, told them that those whom they feared were unwarlike; that after these no other nations stood in their way of traversing all the wide spaces which remained and coming to the end of the world and at the same time to
- 20 the end of their labours. The Ganges and the multitude of nations which were beyond that river he had sacrificed to their fears; he had diverted his arms to a quarter where there was equal glory but less danger.
- 21 Already they were in sight of the Ocean,^a already the breezes of the sea were wafted to them; let them not begrudge him the renown which he sought. They would pass the bournes of Hercules and Father Liber, and thus give their king immortal fame at little cost to themselves. Let them allow him to return from India, not to leave it in flight.
- 22 Every assemblage, especially one of soldiers, is fickle and carried away by impulse; thus is sedition
- 23 no harder to quell than to arouse. Never before were such cries of joy sent forth by the army; they bid him lead on with the favour of the gods, and to equal in glory those whom he is emulating.^b Alexander, elated by these acclamations, at once broke

- 25 Macedonians. And daylight was already approaching, when the king, now confident and full of hope, ordered his eager soldiers to arm themselves and go forth to battle. But the barbarians—it is not known whether through fear or because a disagreement had arisen among them—at any rate suddenly took to flight and gained the mountains, which were remote and full of obstacles. The king vainly pursued their army, but took their baggage.
- 26 Next they arrived at a town of the Sudracæ^a in which many of the enemy had taken refuge, although they had no greater confidence in their walls than
- 27 in their arms. The king was already approaching them, when a soothsayer began to warn him not to enter on a siege, or at any rate to postpone it; that

And when Demophon replied that it would most certainly be so, Alexander rejoined: "Do you not think that to me, having before my eyes such important affairs, and not the entrails of animals, nothing could be a greater hindrance than a seer enslaved by superstition?"

^a See Arr. vi. 9. 2-3, who says that he entered the city through a gate, and then mounted on a ladder to the citadel.

^b That is, the towers of the citadel.

^c According to Arrian (vi. 9. 3-4), Peucestes and Leonatus came up the same ladder as the king, and Abreas by another ladder.

wall.^a The crown of the wall was narrow and its summit was not marked by battlements, as is usually the case, but a parapet was built all along it and prevented assailants from crossing it. Hence the king was rather clinging to this parapet than standing on its edge, defending himself with his buckler from the spears that fell upon him from every side ; for he was being attacked at long range from the towers ^b and his soldiers could not come up ^c because they were overwhelmed by a storm of weapons from above. But at last shame overcame the greatness of their peril ; for they saw that by their delay the king was being abandoned to the enemy. But their help was delayed by their hurry ; for while each man strove to be the first to reach the top of the wall they overloaded the ladders ; and when these could not hold the burden put upon them, they fell and thus deprived the king of his sole hope. For in the sight of so great an army he stood alone, as if left utterly deserted.

V. By this time he had tired his left hand, by which he was shifting his shield about to parry the shots, and his friends were shouting to him to leap down to them, and were standing ready to catch him ; when he dared an incredible and unheard-of deed, one which added much more to his reputation for rashness than to his glory. For with a headlong leap he threw himself into the city filled with enemies, although he could hardly hope ^d that he would at least die fighting and not unavenged ; for before he could rise to his feet, he was likely to be overpowered and taken prisoner. But by good luck he had balanced his body so well that he alighted on his feet ; hence he was standing erect when he began to fight. Fortune had also provided that he could not be surrounded ; 4 for an aged tree,^a standing close to the wall, had thrown out its branches, thickly clothed with leaves, as if for the very purpose of protecting the king ; against the huge trunk of this he took his place, in such a way as not to be surrounded, receiving on his buckler all the weapons that were hurled at him in 5 front. For although he was single-handed and so many men were attacking him with extreme violence from a distance, yet none dared to come nearer, and more missiles fell in the branches than on his shield.

 6 The king was protected in the first place by the widespread fame of his name, and secondly by 7 desperation, a great incentive to die gloriously. But as constantly new enemies came pouring on, by this time he had caught a vast number of weapons on his shield, his helmet was shattered by stones, and already his knees, wearied by protracted toil, had sunk under 8 him. On seeing this, those who stood nearest rushed upon him incautiously and in contempt of the danger ; two of these he ran through with his sword and laid them dead at his feet. After that no one had the courage to go nearer him, but they assailed him with 9 javelins and arrows from afar. But although a mark for every shot, yet on his knees he had no difficulty had arrows of that length—with so good an aim that it passed through his cuirass and was fixed in his body from which a great jet of blood gushed forth, he let his arm drop as if dying, not even having the strength to draw out the weapon with his right hand. On seeing this, the man who had wounded him ran for-

- 13 him, but finding that not enough strength remained for that effort, he laid hold of the overhanging branches with his right hand and tried to rise. But not even then being able to control his body, he again fell upon his knees, waving his hand as a challenge to the enemy to meet him in single combat, if any-
- 14 one dared. At last Peucestes, having dislodged the defenders of the wall in another part of the town, followed ^a in the king's footsteps ^b and came protecting not himself but the king; Leonnatus, while he was vigorously repulsing the eagerly charging barbarians, was severely wounded in the neck and fell 18 half-dead ^a at the king's feet. Now Peucestes also, exhausted by his wounds, had lowered his shield; the last hope remained in Aristonius. He too was badly wounded and could no longer hold out against so great a number of foemen.

19 Meanwhile news was brought to the Macedonians that the king had been killed. What would have terrified other men animated them. For regardless of all danger, they broke through the wall with mattocks, and when they had made a breach, rushed into the city and cut down the Indi, more of whom fled 20 than dared to engage them. They spared neither old men, women, nor children; whoever met them they believed to be the person by whom the king had been wounded. And at length by the slaughter of the enemy they appeased ^b their just anger.

21 Clitarchus and Timagenes are our authorities for the statement that Ptolemy, who was later king, ^c was present at this battle, but he himself, who certainly was not inclined to depreciate his own glory, has written ^d that he was not there, since he had been sent on an expedition. Such was the carelessness of those who composed the old records, or their credulity, ^e which is an equally great fault.

22 Alexander was carried to his tent and the physicians cut off the shaft of the arrow, which was firmly fixed in his body, taking care not to stir the point.

24 was enlarged by the knife. But they feared that the flow of blood could not be staunched by those who performed the operation; for the arrow was very long and seemed to have penetrated the vital parts.

25 Critobulus,^a who was a physician of distinguished skill, but was terrified in the face of such great risk, dreaded to put his hand to the work, lest the result of the treatment, if unsuccessful, might recoil upon

26 his own head. The king observed that he was weeping and near to fainting from fear and anxiety and said: "For what and for how long are you waiting, and why do you not free me as soon as possible from this pain and let me at least die? Do you perhaps fear that you may be blamed because I have received an incur-

27 able wound?" But Critobulus, having at last ended his fear, or concealed it, began to urge that he let himself be held while he was withdrawing the point; that even a slight movement of his body would be 28 dangerous. When the king had assured him that there was no need of any to hold him, he kept his body motionless, as had been ordered.

So when the wound had been laid open and the barb extracted, a copious amount of blood began to flow, the king swooned,^b darkness veiled his eyes,

29 and he lay stretched out as if he were dead. And while they were vainly trying to staunch the flow of blood by applications, his friends began to cry out and to weep, believing that he had breathed his last. At last the blood ceased to flow, and the king gradually recovered his senses and began to recognize those

- VI. The king, after his wound had been treated for seven days but had not yet cicatrized, hearing that the report of his death had gained strength among the barbarians, ordered two ships to be lashed together, and his tent to be set up in the centre, where it would be conspicuous to everyone, in order that from it he might show himself to those who believed that he was dead, and, being seen by the inhabitants, he put an end to the enemies hope which they had conceived from the false report.
- 2 Then he went on down the river,^b keeping some distance ahead of the rest of the fleet, in order that the quiet which he still needed in his very weak condition might not be interfered with by the beat of the oars.
- 3 On the fourth day after he had begun his voyage he came into a region which was indeed deserted by all its inhabitants, but abounded in grain and cattle. The place suited him for resting both himself and his
- 4 soldiers. It was the custom for the principal men among the king's friends and for his body-guard to keep watch before his tent whenever he had fallen ill; since this custom was being observed at that
- 5 time as usual, they all entered his chamber. Alexander, anxious lest they brought some serious news, because they had all come at once, asked whether a fresh approach of the enemy was being reported.

forever, whereas I measure myself by the extent of 19 my glory rather than that of my life. I might, content with the kingdom of my sire, within the limits of Macedonia amid idleness have awaited an obscure and inglorious old age. And yet even the indolent cannot control their destiny, but a premature death often surprises those who consider length of days the only blessing. But I, who count not my years but my victories, if I keep a correct account of Fortune's favours, have already had a long life.

20 "Beginning my reign in Macedonia, I hold dominion over Greece, I have subdued Thrace and the Illyrians, I rule the Triballi and the Maedi, I possess Asia from where it is washed by the Hellespont to the shores of the Red Sea. And now I am not far from the end of the world, and passing beyond this, I have resolved to open to myself a new realm of Nature, a new

 3 in their revolt. Their chief was Athenodorus, who had even assumed the title of king, not so much from a desire for power, as for returning to his fatherland along with those who acknowledged his authority.
 4 Against him a certain Biton of the same nation, but hostile to Athenodorus because of rivalry, laid a plot, and having invited him to a banquet, had him assassinated at table by a Bactrian called Boxus.
 5 On the following day Biton called an assembly and convinced the majority that Athenodorus without provocation had plotted to take his life ; but others suspected imposture on the part of Biton and the 6 suspicion gradually began to spread to more. Accordingly, the Greek soldiers armed themselves, intending to kill Biton if an opportunity offered ; but their leading men appeased the wrath of the multitude.
 7 Biton, rescued from imminent danger contrary to his expectation, a little later plotted against those who had saved him. But when his treachery became 8 known, they seized both him and Boxus. The latter they ordered to be put to death at once and Biton also, but after suffering torture. And they were already applying the instruments of torture to his body, when the Greeks—for what reason is uncertain 9 —as if crazed, rushed to arms. When their tumult was heard, those who had been ordered to torture Biton, left him, for fear that they would be prevented from carrying out their orders by the cries of the 10 rioting soldiers. He, stripped naked as he was,^a came to the Greeks, and the pitiable aspect of the man who had been condemned to death suddenly changed their

12 In the meantime a hundred envoys came to the king from the two nations of which mention has been made.^b All rode in chariots and were men of uncommon stature and dignified bearing; their robes were of linen,^c embroidered with inwrought gold and

They said that they surrendered to him themselves, their cities, and their lands, and would entrust^d for the first time the liberty which they had preserved inviolate for so many ages to his protection and authority; that it was the gods that advised their submission to him, not fear, since they assumed the yoke while their strength was unim-

15 were faithfully carried out by the barbarians. Then he invited the envoys and the petty kings of the nations to a banquet, and ordered a magnificent feast to be prepared. A hundred golden couches had been placed at a small distance from each other; the couches he had hung about with purple tapestries gleaming with gold, displaying in that banquet all that was corrupt in the ancient luxury of the Persians or in the new fashions adopted by the Macedonians, thus intermingling the vices of both nations.

Some through jealousy and malice carped at him with mingled seriousness and jest, saying that they had as a companion a useless brute with an over-fed body ; that while they entered battle, he, dripping
- 17 with oil, was preparing his belly for feasts. Thus it was that at the banquet Corratas, a Macedonian, already overcome by wine, began to upbraid Dioxippus, and to demand that, if he were a man, he should fight with him on the following day with swords ; that the king at last would have an opportunity to judge of Corratas' rashness or the other's
- 18 cowardice. And the challenge was accepted by Dioxippus, who contemptuously made sport of the soldier's bravado. And on the next day the king, since they even more earnestly demanded the contest, and he was unable to dissuade them, allowed
- 19 what they desired to be carried out. A great number of soldiers, including the Greeks, favoured Dioxippus. The Macedonian had assumed his usual arms, holding in his left hand a bronze shield and a spear—they call it sarisa—in his right a lance, and girt with a sword, as if he were going to fight with
- 20 several men at once ; Dioxippus, gleaming with oil and wearing a garland, displayed a purple cloth in his left hand, and in his right a stout knotted club. This very thing had filled the minds of all with eager anticipation ^b ; since for a naked man to fight with one in full armour seemed not only rashness, but madness.
- 21 Then the Macedonian, not doubting that his foe could be killed at long range, hurled his lance. Diox-

- ippus avoided it by a slight movement of his body, and before the other could transfer his spear to his right hand, leaped upon him and broke the spear in 22 two with his club. Having lost both his missiles, the Macedonian had begun to draw his sword, when Dioxippus seized him in his arms, suddenly knocked his feet from under him, and butted him to the ground; then snatching his sword from him, he set his foot upon the Macedonian's neck as he lay prostrate, and poising his club to strike him, would have crushed his defeated adversary with it, had he not been prevented by the king.
- 23 The result of this spectacle was displeasing, not only to the Macedonians, but to the king, especially because the barbarians had witnessed it; for he regretted that the famous valour of the Macedonians was 24 exposed to ridicule. For this reason the ears of the king were opened to the calumnies of jealous rivals. And a few days later at a feast a golden cup was purposely abstracted,^a and the attendants went to the king, pretending to have lost what they had 25 actually hidden. Often there is less firmness in innocent embarrassment than in genuine guilt. Dioxippus could not endure the gaze of all eyes by which he was marked as a thief, and leaving the banquet, he wrote a letter to be delivered to the king, and 26 killed himself with his sword. The king was greatly grieved by his death, believing it to be a sign of indignation rather than of repentance, especially after the excessive joy of his rivals showed that he had been falsely accused.

Then the king ordered Craterus to lead on his forces at no great distance from the river down which he was going to sail, but those who were accustomed to attend him he embarked upon ships and sailed downstream to the lands of the Malli.^c

4 From there he went on to the Sambagrae,^d a strong race of India, which was governed by the will of the people, not the power of kings. They had 60,000 infantry and 6000 cavalry; these forces were followed by 500 chariots. They had chosen three leaders 5 distinguished for valour in war. But the people in the fields adjoining the river—and they had many villages, especially on its bank—when they saw the whole stream as far as they could see covered ^e with ships, and shining arms of so many soldiers, stunned by the novel sight, believed an army of gods was coming and another Father Liber, a name celebrated 6 among those nations. Hence the shouting of the soldiers, hence the beat of the oars and the confused cries of the rowers, as they encouraged one another, 7 had filled their ears ^f with terror. Therefore they all ran to those who were under arms, crying that they were mad and were about to do battle with gods; that like plumbum candidum and aes candidum, it denotes the presence of an alloy, but whether for increasing the beauty or the strength of the iron is uncertain.

- prisoners, Alexander entered the domain of King Sambus,^a and after receiving many towns in surrender took the strongest city^b of the nation by a subterranean passage. To the barbarians, who were inexperienced in military operations, this seemed like a prodigy ; for armed men came up out of the earth almost in the middle of the city, no indication having been given beforehand of the digging of the passage-way.^c Clitarchus states that 80,000 Indi were killed in that region, and many captives sold at auction.
- Again the Musicani revolted ; Pithon^d was sent to subdue them, captured the principal man of the race, who was also the instigator of the rebellion and brought him to Alexander. The king had him crucified, and returned again to the river, on which he had ordered the fleet to wait for him.
- Then, three days later, he sailed down the river to a town at the extremity of the realm of Sambus. That king had lately given himself up, but the people of the city rejected his authority and had closed the gates of the town. The king, despising the smallness of their number, ordered 500 of the Agriani to advance to the wall, and by slowly retiring to lure the enemy outside of the town ; for they would be sure to follow, if they believed that the Agriani were in flight. The Agriani, as had been ordered, after attacking the enemy, suddenly turned their backs ; the barbarians, hotly pursuing them, fell in with other troops, among whom was King Alexander himself. Hence the battle was renewed, and of 3000 barbarians 600 were killed, 1000 captured, and the rest shut within the walls of the city. But the victory was not so happy in its outcome as it appeared to be at first sight ; for the barbarians had poisoned their swords. In consequence the wounded died one after the other, and no cause for so speedy ^a a death could be imagined by the physicians, since even slight wounds were incurable.

- 21 Now the barbarians had hoped that the incautious and rash king might be one of the victims. But although he fought among the foremost, he was 22 fortunate enough to escape untouched. Ptolemy, who was wounded in the left shoulder, slightly it is true but with greater danger than that caused by the wound, had caused the king special anxiety. He was a blood-relation, and some believed him to be a son of Philip ^b; at any rate it was known for certain that he was the offspring of one of that king's con-
 23 cubines. He was also a member of Alexander's body-guard ^c and a most valiant warrior, and even greater and more distinguished in the arts of peace than in those of war; modest and affable in his manner of life, particularly generous and easy of access, he had assumed none of the haughtiness of 24 royal origin. Because of these qualities it could be doubted whether he was dearer to the king or to the people; at all events, it was at that time that he first realized the affection of his countrymen; which was so great that in that time of his peril the Macedonians seemed to have presaged the rank to which he afterwards rose. ^d

- 25 But indeed their solicitude for Ptolemy was no greater than that of the king. For when Alexander, wearied by fighting and by anxiety, had taken his place beside Ptolemy, he ordered the bed on which 26 he himself slept to be brought in. As soon as he lay down upon it, he immediately fell into a profound sleep. When he awoke, he said that in a dream a serpent had appeared to him, carrying an herb in its mouth, which it had indicated to be a cure for the 27 poison; and the king declared too that he would recognize the colour of the herb if anyone could find it. Then, when it was found—for it was sought by many at the same time ^a—he placed it upon the wound; and immediately the pain ceased and within a short

IX. Being compelled to stay there for a longer time, because the guides, who had been carelessly guarded, had made their escape, he sent men to look for others. When none were found, the desire of visiting the Ocean and going to the ends of the world prevailed upon him, without guides who knew the region, to entrust his own life and the safety of so how quiet the mouth of the river was, whether it was navigable by ships of war, was divined by uncertain and blind conjecture ; the sole consolation for the rash enterprise was the king's perpetual good fortune.

3 Already they had gone on for 400 stadia, when the pilots made known to the king that they felt sea air 4 and that the Ocean was not far distant. He, filled with joy, began to urge the sailors to bend to the oars, saying that the end of their labours, so ardently desired, was at hand ; now nothing was wanting to complete their glory, nothing left to oppose their valour, without any decision of Mars, without bloodshed, they were taking the very edge of the world ; not even Nature could go farther ; soon they would see what 5 was unknown except to the immortals. Nevertheless he sent a few men ashore in a boat, to take some of the peasants who were roving about, from whom he hoped to get more accurate information. They, after searching all the huts, at last found some hidden 6 in them. These, when asked how far away the sea was, answered that they had never even heard of any sea ; but that on the third day they could reach bitter water, which spoiled the fresh water.

It was clear that this was a description of the sea by those who were not acquainted with its nature ; 7 and so the boatmen rowed on with great eagerness, and each succeeding day, as the fulfilment of their hopes drew nearer, their ardour increased. By the third day sea water mixed with the river met them, as the tide, which was still gentle, mingled the different 8 waters. Then carried to another island, situated in the middle of the river, somewhat more slowly because their speed being retarded by the tide, they brought their fleet to the shore and ran about to

It was nearly the third hour, when the Ocean, in its regular change,^a began to be carried on a flood-tide into the river, and pushed it back. The boat, at first checked and then pushed more violently, was driven upstream with greater speed than that of rivers^b running in flood in a precipitous channel. The nature of the sea was unknown to the common soldiers,^c who thought that they were witnessing portents and signs of the anger of the gods when the sea continually swelled and overflowed to flood fields that shortly before were dry.
- Now the ships were lifted and the whole fleet was scattered, and those who had gone on shore, alarmed and amazed by the unexpected calamity, ran from every side back to the ships. But in times of confusion even haste is slow.^d Some were pushing at the ships with poles, others had taken their seats while they were prevented from putting their oars in place, some in their haste to sail, without waiting for those who ought to have been with them, were weakly struggling with crippled and unmanageable ships,^e other ships had taken all those who rushed inconsiderately into them; and equally too great and too small numbers delayed their haste. Here some were shouting to wait, there others, to go on, and the contradictory cries of those who never demanded one and the same action had prevented the use; not only of the eyes, but also of the ears. And there was no help even in the pilots, for their voice could not be heard in the tumult, nor could their orders be carried out by the frightened and disordered sailors.
- Hence the ships began to be dashed together, and

- 17 Prows were dashed against sterns, those ships that damaged ships in front of them were in turn injured by ships behind them; from angry words they even came to blows.
- 18 And now the tide had flooded all the plains about the river except for mounds projecting like small islands, to which many in their trepidation hastened
- 19 to swim, deserting the ships. The scattered fleet stood, a part in very deep water, where valleys had made low ground, a part were stranded on shoals, wherever the waters had covered land of uneven but rising level; when on a sudden a new cause of terror, greater than the former one, surprised
- 20 them. The sea began to flow back with great pull,^a as the waters ran back to their own channel and restored the lands which a little before had been submerged in deep surge. Hence some of the ships, being thus stranded, were thrown upon their prows, others fell upon their sides. The fields were strewn with baggage, arms, and fragments of
- 21 broken planks and oars. The soldiers dared neither to land nor to stay aboard, since they were awaiting more serious calamities than the present that might follow at any time. They could hardly believe that they actually beheld what they were experiencing, shipwreck on dry land, the sea in the river.

ties. Horrible sea-beasts too, left by the tide, were 23 roaming about. And already night was drawing near, and despair of safety had disturbed even the king himself. However his cares did not so master his indomitable spirit as to keep him from spending the whole night on the watch and sending horsemen ahead to the mouth of the river, in order that when they saw that the tide was rising again, they might 24 outstrip it. He also gave orders that the ships which were damaged should be repaired, that those which had been overturned by the waves should be raised, and that everyone should be prepared and alert 25 when the sea had again flooded the lands. When all that night had been spent in watching and in encouraging the army, at the same time the horsemen came fleeing for safety at top speed, and the tide followed. This at first, as the waters came under them with gentle flow, began to lift the ships, and then, when all the fields were flooded, even set the fleet in motion.

26 Then the hand-claps and cheers of the soldiers and boatmen, hailing with unrestrained joy the unexpected safety, made the shores and banks resound.
 In wonder they asked one another whence so great a sea had suddenly returned, whither it had fled the day before, what was the nature of this same element which was at one moment at variance with the strict laws of time, and at another so subject to them.
 27 The king, since from what had happened he conjectured that the regular time was after sunrise, in the middle of the night, in order to anticipate the tide, with a few ships went down the river and, prayers. Then, after sacrificing to the gods presiding over the sea and the region, he returned to the fleet.

X. Next the fleet went up the river, and on the second day was moored near a salt lake,^a the unknown nature of which deceived those who rashly entered its waters. For a scabby itch attacked their bodies and the contagion of the ailment was communicated also to others. A remedy was oil. Then Leonnatus was sent ahead, to dig wells along the route by which he seemed likely to lead the army in a march by land—for the region was dry—while Alexander himself with his troops remained where he was, waiting for the springtime.^b Meanwhile he both founded several cities and ordered Nearchus and Onesicritus, who were skilled in navigation,^c to sail the strongest ships down to the Ocean, and having gone as far as they safely could, to make themselves acquainted with the nature of the sea, saying that when they wished to return to him, they could come up either by that same river or by the Euphrates.

4 And when the winter was nearly over, he burned the ships which seemed useless, and led the army
5 by land.^d On the ninth day he came into the region of the Arabitae, and from there in the same number of days into that of the Cedrosii. This free people, after having held a council, surrendered themselves, and nothing was demanded of the surrendered

barren and poor in water met him ; having passed through this, he crossed into the land of the Horitae. There he handed over the greater part of the army to Hephaestion and shared the light-armed troops 7 with Ptolemy^a and Leonnatus. Three armies at the same time were pillaging the Indi, and a great amount of booty was driven off ; Ptolemy was burning the maritime regions, the king himself and in another direction Leonnatus, the rest of the country. In this region also he founded a city,^b and colonized it with Arachosii.

- 8 From there he came to the Indi who dwell along the sea-coast.^c They occupy a great extent of country which is barren and desolate, and mingle in no kind of 9 intercourse even with their neighbours. Their very solitude has made quite wild their dispositions, which are savage even by nature ; their nails grow long, never having been cut, their hair is shaggy and unshorn.
 10 They adorn their huts with shells^d and other things thrown up by the sea. Clad in the skins of wild beasts, they feed upon fish cured in the sun, and also on the flesh of larger animals cast up by the sea.
 11 Therefore, since their supplies were used up,^e the Macedonians began to suffer at first scarcity, and finally starvation, grubbing everywhere for the roots of palms—for that is the only kind of tree that grows 12 there. And when even this nourishment had failed them, they began to kill their draught animals, not even abstaining from the horses. And when they had nothing to carry their packs, they burned the spoils taken from the enemy, for the sake of which they had traversed the remotest parts of the Orient.

- 13 Then pestilence followed hunger. For the harmful juices of the unwholesome viands, added to the labour of marching and anxiety of mind, had spread diseases, and they could neither remain where they were nor advance without danger of death ; if they remained, famine, if they went on, a deadlier enemy, pesti-14 lence, assailed them. Hence the plains were strewn with almost more bodies of the dying than of the dead. And not even those who were slightly ill were able to follow ; for the army was led on rapidly, since each man believed that the army was making the more progress towards the hope of safety, the more 15 they cut short their journey by hurrying. Therefore those who had given out besought those whom they knew, and strangers as well, to succour them ; but there were no animals by which they could be taken on, and the soldiers could barely carry their arms and the sight of the evil which threatened themselves was before their eyes. Therefore, though often called back, they could not endure even to look upon their comrades, but pity was overcome by fear.
 16 Those others, being left behind, called upon the gods as witnesses, on their common sacred rites, and on the aid of the king, and when they found that they were wearying deaf ears to no purpose, despair turned to madness and they prayed that those to whom they appealed might have a fate like their own and friends and comrades as cruel as themselves.
- 17 The king, oppressed by grief, and at the same time by shame,^a because he himself was the cause of such a great disaster, sent messengers to Phrataphernes, satrap of the Parthyaeci, to order cooked food to be brought on camels, and informed other governors of 18 neighbouring regions of his necessities. And they did not delay. And so the army, saved at least from starvation, was at last led into the country of Cedrosia.^a That is a land with a soil productive of all fruits; there he encamped for some time, in order 19 to recuperate the suffering soldiers with rest. Here he received a letter from Leonnatus,^b saying that he had fought with 8000 infantry and 400 cavalry of the Horitae with successful result.^c From Craterus also came the news that he had defeated Ozines and Zariaspes, Persian nobles who were attempting 20 a revolt, and that they were in fetters. Therefore, having made Sibyrtius^d governor of that region—for Menon, its prefect, had lately fallen ill and died—21 he himself advanced into Carmania. The satrap of that nation was Astaspes,^e who was suspected of having wished to revolt while the king was in India. When Astaspes came to meet him, Alexander dissembled his anger, and, addressing him graciously, kept him in his same rank until he could inquire into what had been reported.

 22 Then, when the governors, as had been ordered, had sent a great supply of horses and yoked draught-cattle from all the region which was under their rule, the king restored their equipment^f to those who 23 lacked it. Their arms also were replaced with equally handsome ones; for they were not far from Persia,

Father Liber which he had carried off from those nations, but also his procession,^a whether that was a triumph first invented by that god or the sport of drunken revellers, he decided to imitate it, in a spirit 25 raised above the level of human greatness. To this end, he ordered the villages through which his route lay to be strewn with flowers and garlands, mixing-bowls filled with wine, and other vessels of unusual size to be placed everywhere on the thresholds of the houses, then carriages to be spread, so that each might hold many soldiers, and to be equipped like tents, some with white curtains, and others with costly tapestries.

26 At the head marched the king's friends and the royal troop,^b wreathed with chaplets made of a variety of flowers ; on one side was heard the music of flute-players, on another the notes of the lyre ; the army also joined the revels in vehicles adorned according to the means of each man and hung around with their most beautiful arms. The king and his companions rode in a chariot loaded down with golden 27 bowls and huge beakers of the same material. In this way the army for seven days marched in a riotous procession, an easy prey if the conquered had had any courage even against revellers ; a single thousand, by Heaven !, provided they were real men and sober, could have captured in the midst of their triumph those who for seven days had been heavy with 28 drunkenness. But Fortune, who assigns renown and value to actions, turned to glory even this disgrace to an army. Both the age of that time, and afterwards posterity, regarded it as wonderful that they marched guard, probably including the young men referred to in viii.

BOOK X

CONTENTS OF BOOK X

Alexander shows severity towards corrupt governors. Nearchus and Onesicritus return and report what they have learned and heard. The undeserved execution of Orsines, satrap of Parsagada. Revolt of the Odrysae in Thrace (i).

Disturbances in Greece. The governors in Asia are ordered to disband all their foreign troops. Harpalus, whom Alexander had made satrap of Babylon, fearing that he has lost the king's favour because of his offences, embezzles 5000 talents of the royal treasure and escapes to Europe, hoping to lead the Athenians to join him.

Alexander plans to go to Athens, but learns that Harpalus, driven from Athens, has been killed in Crete. Alexander pays the debts of the soldiers, intending to send the older ones home and retain the rest. A mutiny takes place in the camp, which he quells (ii).

Alexander punishes thirteen of the mutineers. He calls an assembly of the foreign soldiers and praises them (iii).

He chooses his body-guard and his attendants from the Persians. As the ringleaders of the revolt are being taken by Persian attendants to execution, one of them remonstrates with the king.

Alexander, in a rage, gives orders to throw them all into the river, bound as they were. The army submits to this and even calls for the punishment of others, if guilty (iv).

The soldiers stand before the king's quarters in their tunics and beg for admission ; they are willing to be punished. His anger persists for two days. He then appears, and after mildly censuring their lack of discipline, declares that he is reconciled with them. He offers a splendid sacrifice and invites the leading men of the Persians and the Macedonians to a banquet. Then all the weaker soldiers are mustered out with pay for past services and a talent each for travelling expenses. He gives orders that all sons begotten from Asiatic wives be left with him. More than 10,000 veterans, led by Craterus, are discharged and sent to Greece. Antipater is directed to give them special honours and privileges. Craterus is made governor of Macedonia, and Antipater is ordered to come to Alexander with reinforcements. Because of discord between Antipater and Olympias the king is suspicious of Antipater as being too important for a prefect. After making changes in the army, Alexander comes to Celonae, a town occupied by the descendants of Boeotians driven from their homes by Xerxes. A quarrel arises between Eumenes and Hephaestion. Alexander comes to Media, celebrated for its fine horses. At Ecbatana he offers sacrifices and celebrates games, and relaxes his mind with banquets. Hephaestion is taken ill and dies. His body is taken to Babylon and given a magnificent funeral. Alexander orders mourning for Hephaestion throughout the empire, and his friends vie with him in honouring Hephaestion; he is persuaded that Hephaestion is a god and Agathocles, a Samian, falls into great danger by weeping for him as if he were dead. Alexander marches against the Cossaei, a rude and warlike nation; he subdues them within 40 days. He founds cities and marches to Babylon. Nearchus warns him not to enter the city, but he scorns the prediction of the Chaldeans. He sails on the river Pallacopas to the land of the Arabians. He founds a city, in which he settled the aged and infirm Greeks and others who wished to remain there. In spite of many unfavourable omens, he enters Babylon. He is entertained by Nearchus at a banquet, and when he was about to retire was persuaded by Medius to attend a drinking-bout. After spending the night in drinking he is taken ill and within six days his strength is exhausted. The troops insist on being admitted to see him.

On his death-bed Alexander remained in the same posture until he had saluted every man in the army. He gives his ring to Perdiccas, and directs that his body be taken to Ammon. He dies, saying that he left his kingdom "to the best man." A summary of his good qualities and his defects. His invariable good fortune (v).

Consultation as to his successor, and the various opinions of the Macedonians (vi).

QUINTUS CURTIUS

Meleager favours Alexander's brother Arrhidaeus. Pithon names Perdiccas and Leonnatus as regents for an expected son of Roxanê. Arrhidaeus with a guard of footsoldiers breaks into the king's quarters. Perdiccas and Leonnatus with their cavalry decide to leave the city (vii).

Meleager urges Arrhidaeus to kill Perdiccas. Perdiccas takes a position in the plains and afflicts Babylon with hunger. Arrhidaeus, desirous of peace, tries to quiet the disturbance (viii).

Perdiccas, while he is making a lustration of the army in the Macedonian manner, by a stratagem kills Meleager and about 30 other fomenters of discord (ix).

Perdiccas partitions Alexander's empire, giving the main part to Arrhidaeus and himself, the remainder to the leaders of the Macedonian forces. Rumour that Alexander was poisoned. The king's body is embalmed in the manner of the Egyptians and Chaldeans and taken by Ptolemy to Memphis and later to Alexandria (x).

BOOK X

I. AT about that same time ^a Cleander and Sitalces,^b and Heracon with Agathon arrived, who at the king's 2 order had killed Parmenion. 5000 infantry with 1000 horsemen followed them, but also accusers from the provinces of which they had been governors. And the service rendered by the assassination, although very pleasing to the king, could not make amends for the many crimes which they had committed. For not only had they pillaged everything secular, but they had not even withheld their hands from sacred objects, and maidens and women of high station who had suffered violation were weeping for 4 the insult to their persons. Their greed and lust had made the name of the Macedonians hateful to the 5 barbarians. Among them all, however, the mad passion ^c of Cleander was preëminent, who after having assaulted a maiden of high birth had given her to one of his slaves as a concubine.

6 Very many of Alexander's friends had an eye, not so much to the atrocity of the crimes that were openly laid to the charge of these men, as to the memory that they had killed Parmenion, which might secretly help the accused with the king; and they rejoiced that his anger had recoiled upon the tools of his anger, and that no power gained through crime was lasting

- 7 for anyone. The king, having examined the case, declared that the accusers had passed over one crime, and that the greatest of all, namely, despair of his safety; for they never would have ventured on such conduct, if they had either wished him to return safely from India or had believed that he would 8 return. Therefore he bound these men in fetters, but ordered the 600 soldiers who had been the instru-9 ments of their cruelty to be put to death. On the same day punishment was inflicted upon those also whom Craterus had brought in, who were responsible for the revolt of the Persians.
- 10 Not long afterwards Nearchus and Onesicritus arrived, whom he had ordered to advance some dis-11 tance into the Ocean. They reported some things from hearsay, others which they had learned from observation: that there was an island opposite the mouth of the river, which abounded in gold, but lacked horses ^a—these, they had learned, were bought at a talent apiece from those who ventured to bring them from the mainland—that the sea was full of 12 whales ^b; that these, huge as great ships, floated with the course of the tide, and when frightened off by the blast of the trumpet, from following the ships, plunged under the water with a great roaring of the sea, like so many sunken vessels.
- 13 As to other matters they had taken the word of the natives; that the Red Sea was so called, not from the colour of its waters, as most people believed, but 14 from a King Erythrus ^c; that there was, not far from the mainland, an island thickly planted with palm-groves, and that in about the middle of the wood a lofty column arose, marking the grave of King Erythrus and inscribed in the characters of that merchants, whose pilots had followed the report of gold, had crossed to the island, but after that had 16 never been seen by them again. The king, fired with eagerness to know more, bade them go back and coast along the shore until they brought the fleet to the mouth of the Euphrates; from there they would go up the river to Babylon.

- 17 Alexander himself, having embraced infinite plans in his mind, had determined, after thoroughly subduing the entire seacoast of the Orient,^a to cross from Syria to Africa, being incensed against the Carthaginians,^b then passing through the deserts of Numidia, to direct his course to Gades—for the report had spread abroad that the pillars of Hercules were there 18 —then to visit Spain, which the Greeks called Hiberia from the river Hiberus, to approach and skirt the Alps and the seacoast of Italy, from which it is 19 only a short voyage to Epirus. With this in view he ordered the governors of Mesopotamia to cut timber on Mt. Libanus, transport it to Thapsacus, a city of Syria, and lay the keels of 700 ships; all were to be septiremes, and to be taken to Babylon. The kings of the Cypriotes^c were ordered to furnish copper, hemp and sails.

who had wounded the latter had been punished.

Eudaemon ^a—he was a general of the Thracians—and gave the kingdom of Abisares to that king's son.

- 22 From there they came to Parsagada; that is a Persian race, whose satrap was Orsines, prominent among all the barbarians for high birth and wealth.
- 23 He traced his descent from Cyrus, formerly king of the Persians; he had wealth, both what he had inherited from his forefathers and what he himself had amassed during long possession of sovereignty.
- 24 He met the king with gifts of every kind, intending to give presents not only to Alexander but to his friends as well. Troops of tamed horses followed him and chariots adorned with silver and gold, costly furniture and splendid gems, golden vases of great weight, purple vestments, and 3000 talents of coined
- 25 silver. But this great generosity of the barbarian was the cause of his death. For when he had honoured all the friends of the king with gifts beyond their highest hopes, to Bagoas,^b a eunuch who had won the regard of Alexander through prostitution, he
- 26 paid no honour, and on being admonished by some that Bagoas was dear to Alexander, replied that he was honouring the friends of the king, not his harlots, and that it was not the custom of the Persians to mate with males who made females of themselves by prostitution.
- 27 On hearing this, the eunuch exercised the power which he had gained by shame and disgrace against the life of an eminent and guiltless man. For he secretly supplied the most worthless fellows of that same nation with false accusations, warning them not to make them public until he himself should have
- 28 given the word. Meanwhile, whenever no witnesses were present, he filled the credulous ears of the king

- with lies, concealing the reason for his anger, in order to add greater weight to his accusations.
- 29 Orsines as yet was not suspected, but nevertheless was already less esteemed; for he was secretly ^a being incriminated without being aware of the hidden danger. And that most shameless harlot, not forgetting his deception even amid debauchery and the endurance of shame, whenever he had aroused the king's passion for himself, charged Orsines now with avarice, sometimes even with treason.
- 30 And now the calumnies were ripe for the ruin of a blameless man, and Fate was on hand, whose will is inescapable. For it chanced that Alexander ordered the tomb of Cyrus ^b to be opened, in which his body had been laid at rest, and to which Alexander wished
- 31 to pay funereal honours. He had believed it to be a storehouse filled with gold and silver—for that was common rumour among the Persians—, but except the king's mouldering shield, two Scythian bows,^c
- 32 and a scimitar he found nothing. However, having placed a crown of gold upon the coffin in which the body lay, he covered it over with the robe which he himself was accustomed to wear, expressing surprise that a king of such renown and endowed with such power had been buried no more sumptuously than
- 33 if he had been one of the common folk. The eunuch was at Alexander's side; looking significantly at him, he said: "What wonder if the tombs of kings are empty, when the houses of their satraps cannot contain the gold that they have amassed from them?"
- 34 For my part, I had never seen the tomb before, but I learned from Darius that 3000 talents of gold were
- 35 buried with Cyrus. Hence that generosity to you, in order that what Orsines could not keep with safety, he might even curry favour by giving away."

36 He had already aroused the king's mind to anger, when those to whom he had entrusted the same business arrived. On one side Bagoas, on the other those whom he had suborned, filled the king's ears 37 with false charges. Before Orsines suspected that he was being accused he was delivered into bondage. Not content with the punishment of an innocent man,^a the eunuch laid his hand upon him as he was about to be executed. Orsines with a glance at him said: "I had heard that women once reigned in Asia; this however is something new, for a eunuch to 38 reign!" Such was the end of one of the noblest of the Persians, who was not only blameless but of remark-39 able kindness towards the king. At the same time Phradates,^b suspected of aspiring to royal power, was put to death. Alexander had begun to be too hasty in inflicting prompt punishment, and also in 40 believing calumnies; so true is it that success is able to change one's nature, and that rarely is anyone cautious enough towards his own good fortune.^c For this same man shortly before had not been able to bring himself to punish Lyncestes Alexander^d 41 though he had been charged by two witnesses, had even suffered humbler criminals to be acquitted against his desire because the rest believed them innocent, and had restored their thrones to van-42 quished enemies; but towards the end of his life he had so degenerated from his true self, that though formerly of a mind proof against lust, at the caprice of a catamite he gave kingdoms to some and took life from others.

letter from Coenus ^a about what had happened in Europe and Asia while the king subdued India. 44 Zopyrion, governor of Thrace, while making an expedition against the Getae, had been overwhelmed with his whole army by tempests and gales which 45 suddenly arose.^b On learning of this disaster Seuthes had forced his subjects the Odrysae to revolt. While Thrace was almost lost, Greece also ^c did not remain unshaken by disturbances. For Alexander, by punishing the insolence of certain satraps who, while he was detained at the end of the world by war with the Indi, had practised the greatest and most disgraceful crimes against the provincials, had inspired fear in the rest. These, being guilty of like offences and fearing the same punishment for their crimes, took refuge in the protection of the mercenary soldiers, expecting by such troops as these to defend themselves if they should be demanded for punishment, or after exacting as much money as they could, sought safety in flight. After this was known, letters were sent to all the governors of Asia, and when these were read, they found that they were ordered to disband on the spot all the foreign soldiers who were serving under them.

Among these was Harpalus. Alexander, because years before Philip, just on account of the friendship between Harpalus and his son, had driven him out and Harpalus had fled the country, regarded him as one of his most faithful friends. And after the death of Mazaeus he had made him satrap ^d of Babylon and had appointed him custodian of the royal treasures.^e Harpalus, then, having by his flagrant offences lost the confidence which he could have felt in the remarkable favour of the king, abstracted 5000 talents ^f from the royal treasure, hired a band of 6000 mercenaries, and escaped to Europe. For long since, driven headlong by extravagance and his passions, and despairing of pardon from the king, he had looked about for help from others against Alexander's anger, and had sedulously courted the Athenians, whose power and influence with the rest of the Greeks he knew, as well as their secret hatred of the Macedonians. Therefore he pointed out to his followers that the Athenians, knowing of his arrival and seeing before their eyes the forces and the money which he was bringing, would join forces and plans with them at once. For he thought that from an inexperienced and fickle people by making use of unprincipled and venal persons he could gain everything by bribes.

- II. Therefore with thirty ships they cross to Sunium—it is a promontory of the land of Attica—from which they had decided to go to the port ^a of the city. Alexander, having learned this, and being equally incensed at Harpalus and the Athenians, ordered a fleet to be made ready, intending to go at once to Athens. As he was secretly considering this plan, a letter was delivered to him, saying that Harpalus had in fact entered Athens, and by his money had won the support of the leading men ^b but that presently, after an assembly of the people had been held, he was ordered to leave the city ^c and had taken refuge with his Greek soldiers; then he had crossed to Crete in his ships and at the instigation of a friend ^d had been treacherously slain.
- 4 Alexander, rejoicing at this, gave up his design of crossing into Europe, and issued orders that the exiles, ^e except such as were stained by the blood of citizens, should be received by all the Greek cities

Greeks, not daring to disregard his order, although they thought that it marked the beginning of the breakdown of their laws, even restored to those who had been condemned such of their property as was 6 left. The Athenians alone, defenders not only of themselves but also of Greece, could not tolerate such a cesspool of classes and men, being accustomed to be governed, not by the command of a king, but 7 by the laws and ancestral customs; therefore they shut out the exiles from their territories, preferring to endure anything rather than admit what was once the off-scourings^a of their city, and then even of their places of exile.

8 Alexander, having sent the older of his soldiers^b to their native land, ordered 13,000 infantry and 2000 horsemen to be selected for him to retain in Asia, thinking that Asia could be held by an army of moderate size, because he had distributed garrisons in many places and had filled the newly founded cities with colonists desirous of maintaining 9 the status quo. But before selecting those whom he intended to retain, he ordered all the soldiers to make a declaration of their debts. He had learned that many had heavy indebtedness, and although it had been contracted by their own extravagance, he had nevertheless decided to liquidate it himself.
 10 The soldiers, thinking that they were being tested, in order that he might more easily separate the wastrels from the frugal, had delayed for some time in making their reports. And the king, knowing well that it was shame and not stubbornness which kept them from confessing their indebtedness, ordered tables to be set up throughout the whole 11 camp, and 10,000 talents to be brought out. Then at last, when they were satisfied that he was in earnest, they declared their debts. And out of so great a sum of money not more than 130 talents remained. To such an extent had that army, though victor over so many of the richest nations, yet carried off from Asia more victory than booty.

- 12 But when it was known that some were being sent home and others retained, the soldiers, thinking that he would establish the permanent seat of his kingdom in Asia, frenzied and forgetful of military discipline, filled the camp with mutinous talk, and assailing the king more boldly than ever before, began all together to demand their discharge, displaying their faces dis-13 figured with scars and their hoary heads. Prevented by neither the rebukes of their officers nor by respect for the king, with rebellious shouts and military licence they interrupted Alexander when he wished to speak, and openly declared that they would move a step from there in no direction except towards 14 their native land. At last, when silence had been made rather because they thought that he had been influenced than because they could be, they were waiting to see what he would do, when he said :
 15 "What does this sudden disturbance and such insolent and furious lawlessness threaten ? I fear to speak, at least plainly ; you have broken my authority and I am king on sufferance, to whom you have not left the privilege of addressing you, of knowing and advising you, or even of looking you in the face.

- 18 You would have believed that all with one voice raised a shout; so unanimously came the reply from

When the Macedonians who were leaders in this mutiny were being led by these in bonds to execution, they say that one of them, a man of weight in authority and in years, spoke as follows to the king :*

IV. "How long will you gratify your mind even with punishments, and those too of a foreign kind? Your soldiers, your citizens, without a trial and led by their captives, are dragged off to death. If it is your judgement that we deserve death, at least 2 change those who inflict the penalty." The king was admonished in a friendly spirit, if he had been willing to listen to the truth, but his wrath had changed to madness. Therefore he ordered again—for those to whom the order had been given had hesitated—that the mutineers be drowned in the river, bound as 3 they were.^b Not even such a punishment as this roused mutiny among the soldiers. On the contrary, the companies went to the leaders of the forces and to the king's friends, asking that if he judged that there were any besides who were stained with the same guilt, he should order them to be put to death ; that they offered their bodies to his anger ; let him slaughter them. At last,^a almost beside themselves with grief, they ran to the royal quarters in a body, and throwing down their arms before the doors and standing in their tunics, begged with tears that their bodies, unarmed and submissive to punishment, might be admitted. That they did not refuse by the punishment of the guilty to expiate the faults that they had committed through insubordination. That the anger of the king was to them more terrible than death.

But although, continuing to stand day and night before the royal quarters, they manifested their repentance by pitiful outcries and attire, yet the king's wrath held out for two days against his men's most abject prayers. On the third day, overcome by their constant entreaties, he came out, and after mildly censuring the lack of discipline of the army, declared, not without the shedding of many tears by both sides, that he was reconciled with them. Nevertheless the event seemed to call for expiation by greater victims. Accordingly, after offering a splendid sacrifice, he invited the chief men of the Macedonians and at the same time those of the Persians to a feast. It is reported that he entertained 9000 men at that banquet, and that they all, at the king's invitation, made libation from the same bowl, while the priests of the Greeks and of the barbarians dictated not only other propitious prayers, but especially that a union of the two kingdoms should be consolidated for all time in the same body. Then the discharge was hastened, and all the weakest soldiers were mustered out. he not only faithfully gave pay for their past services, but also added a talent to each soldier for travelling expenses.^a

He gave orders that the sons whom they had begotten from Asiatic wives—they are said to have numbered about 10,000—should be left with him, for fear that if they returned to Macedonia with their fathers and mingled with the former wives and children of these, they might fill the families with strife and discord; he promised that he would take care that the children should be trained in the customs of their country and taught the principles of military service. So, more than 10,000 veterans were discharged, and Craterus,^b one of the king's special friends, was appointed to lead them. If anything to which humanity is liable should befall him, they were ordered to obey Polypercon. A letter was also written to Antipater with orders that honour should be paid to the discharged veterans, so that whenever games and athletic contests were celebrated, they should witness them from the first rows of seats and with garlands on their heads, and that the ungrawn children of those who should have died should inherit their fathers' pay. He appointed Craterus governor of Macedonia and the adjacent districts,^c but gave orders that Antipater^d should come to the king with a reinforcement of younger Macedonians. For he feared that through the discord between the governor and Olympias some grave calamity might be suffered. For his mother had sent many letters to Alexander, and Antipater many, in which they charged each other with numerous arrogant and hostile acts which tended to the disgrace or the impairment of the royal majesty. For after the rumour of the king's death, which had been falsely spread abroad, had seeped into Macedonia, his mother and his sister Cleopatra^e had set on foot a revolu-

Incusasse autem ambos fertur et matris insolentia permotus exclamasse, eam pro habitatione decem mensium, quam in utero sibi praeberisset, gravem mercedem exigere, Antipatrum vero suspectum habuisse, parta ex Spartanis victoria, tollere animos et imperio tot iam annos prorogato supra praefecti modum esse elatum. tion, and his sister had taken possession of her father's kingdom,^a and Olympias, of Epirus.

It happened that while letters of that kind were being delivered, Hephaestion, who was wont to be regarded as the confidant of all the king's secrets, was at the same time looking over the letters that had been opened by Alexander. And the king did not prevent him, but taking off his ring from his finger, he laid it upon the reader's lips, signifying that nothing of what had been written should be communicated to others. But he is said to have railed at them both, and, angered by the insolence of his mother, to have said that she for a lodging of ten months which she had furnished him in her womb was exacting a heavy price,^b but that he had held Antipater in suspicion, on the ground that having gained a victory over the Spartans he was growing arrogant, and because of power already prolonged over so many years had risen above the conduct becoming a prefect.* Accordingly, when Antipater's dignity and uprightness were praised by certain men, Alexander replied that he seemed white on the outside, but if he was looked into deeply, he was all purple. Nevertheless he concealed his suspicion and showed no clearer indication of an alienated feeling. Yet very many believed that Antipater, thinking that he was summoned for punishment, was responsible by disloyal plots for the death of the king, which followed shortly afterward.

Meanwhile the king, in order to patch up the losses in his diminished army, mustered all the best of the Persians into the ranks of the Macedonians^c; he also set aside a thousand of the most distinguished for a body-guard; another troop of spearmen, not fewer than 10,000, he ordered to keep watch by night at the royal quarters. As he was doing this, Peucestes appeared with 20,000 archers and slingers which he had mustered from his own province.^a When these had been distributed through the army, the king set out from Susa, and, having crossed the Pasitigris^b River, measured off a camp at Carae. Then, having led his forces for four days through Sittacenê, he advanced to Sambana, and remained there for seven days. Then, after making a march of three days, he arrived at Celonae. This town is occupied by people from Boeotia, whom Xerxes drove from their homes and transferred to the Orient; and they retained as a proof of their origin a language of their own, consisting for the most part of Greek words, but because of the necessity of commerce they used the speech of the neighbouring barbarians. Then he entered Bagistanê, a rich region, abounding in a handsome and prolific growth of trees, and in other things which contribute not only to the necessities, but also to the enjoyment of life.

Meanwhile a serious quarrel had arisen between Eumenes and Hephaestion. For Hephaestion had evicted Eumenes' slaves from the lodging of which they had taken possession for their master, in order that Evius, a flute-player, might be put up in it. And not long afterwards, when their hatred seemed to be already put to sleep, through a new cause of strife that arose it revived to such an extent that they even broke out into a dreadful wrangle and bitter abuse of each other. But by the intervention of Alexander and at his command their enmity was ended, at least in appearance, after he had even threatened Hephaestion, who, since he enjoyed the king's greatest favour, persistently repulsed Eumenes, although the latter was desirous of a reconciliation.

Then they came to the plains of Media, where very great herds of horses were bred; they call them Nisaeon and they are conspicuous for their size and beauty.^c More than 50,000 were found there when Alexander crossed into that country, as was noted by his companions ; that formerly there had been three times that number, but amid the confusion of the wars brigands had driven off the greatest part of them. There the king halted for about thirty days.^a Thither Atropates, satrap of Media, brought a hundred barbarian women^b skilled in horsemanship and armed with round shields and axes ; this equipment led some to believe that they were survivors of the race of the Amazons. Then in seven days he came to Ecbatana, the capital of Media. There he offered solemn sacrifices to the gods,^c exhibited games, and relaxed his mind with banquets and festal days, in order to be stronger for new tasks.

But as he was meditating on these tasks, Fate, as if laying her hand upon him, drew him elsewhere and snatched away the life of the dearest of his friends, and not long afterwards of the king himself. He was viewing the boys contesting in the stadium^d when it was announced that Hephaestion was failing ; he had already been sick abed for seven days from over-indulgence in wine. Alarmed by the danger of his friend, the king at once rose from his seat and quickly went to Hephaestion's lodging. Yet he did not reach there before death had anticipated him. This is certainly regarded as the most grievous of all the losses which Alexander had suffered in his whole lifetime,^e and that he was so overcome by the greatness of his sorrow as to burst into tears and lamentations gave strong proof of a loss of his usual spirit. But there are various reports of his conduct ; this much is agreed by all, that Alexander, in order to give his friend the most splendid obsequies, did not wish him to be buried at Ecbatana, but to be taken by Perdicas to Babylon, to which place he himself was on the point of going ; and that there he had arranged for a funeral of unheard-of splendour at a cost of 12,000 talents. Certain it is that he gave orders for Hephaestion to be mourned throughout the whole empire, and in order that his memory might not be lost in the army, Alexander appointed no leader of the cavalry which he had commanded,^a but wished it to be called the troop of Hephaestion, and that the standards that he had established there should not be changed.^b The king planned funereal contests and games such as had never been given before, and brought together 3000 artists; and these not long after are said to have competed at Alexander's own funeral.

Per universum certe imperium lugeri eum iussit et, ne memoria eius in exercitu exolesceret, equitibus quibus praefuerat nullum praefecit ducem, sed Hephaestionis alam appellari voluit et quae ille signa instituisset, ea non immutari. Funebria certamina ludosque, quales numquam editi fuissent, meditatus, tria milia artificum coegit ; qui non multo post in ipsius exequiis certasse traduntur.

Nec amici tam effuso affectu ad conciliandam eius gratiam segniter usi, certatim repperere per quae memoria defuncti clarior honoratiorque fieret. Eumenes igitur cum se ob similitudinem cum Hephaestione in regis indignationem incurrisse sensisset, multis auctor fuit seque et arma sua Hephaestioni consecrandi pecuniasque ad cohonestandum funus large contulit. Hoc exemplum imitati sunt ceteri ; eoque processit assentantium impudentia, ut regi maerore et desiderio defuncti insanienti persuasum tandem sit, deum esse Hephaestionem.

Quo quidem tempore ex copiarum ducibus Agathocles Samius in extremum periculum venit, quod eius tumultum praeteriens illacrimasse visus est. Ac nisi Perdiccas venanti sibi Hephaestionem apparuisse e mentibus per deos omnes ipsumque Hephaestionem deierasset ex ipso se cognovisse, Agathoclem non ut mortuum et vanae divinitatis titulis frustra ornatum flevisse, verum propter memoriam

The king's friends also, not lacking in zeal to win his favour by such lavish demonstrations of sympathy, vied with one another in devising means of making the memory of the deceased more glorious and more honoured. Accordingly Eumenes, since he felt that he had incurred the king's indignation because of his quarrel with Hephaestion, induced many men to consecrate themselves and their arms to Hephaestion and he himself contributed generously to join in honouring his funeral. The rest followed this example, and their shameless flattery went so far that the king, insane with grief and longing for his dead friend, was at last persuaded that Hephaestion was a god.

At that time, indeed, among the leaders of the forces Agathocles the Samian fell into extreme danger because when passing the tomb of Hephaestion he was seen to have wept over him. And had not Perdicas falsely said that while he was hunting Hephaestion had appeared to him, and had he not sworn by all the gods and by Hephaestion himself that he had learned from him that Agathocles had not wept as over a dead mortal who had vainly been honoured with the title of divinity, but that it was because Ceterum ut paulisper a luctu avocaret animum, in Cossaeorum terram expeditionem suscepit. Iuga Mediae vicina Cossaei tenent, aspera et bellicosa et raptò vivere assueta gens. Ab his Persarum reges annuo tributo pacem redimere solebant, ne in subiectam terram decurrentes latrocinii regionem facerent infestam. Nam vim temptantes Persas facile reppulerant asperitate locorum defensi, in quae se recipiebant, quotiens armis superati erant. Eidem muneribus quotannis placabantur, ut regi Ecbatanis, ubi aestiva solebat agere, Babylonem remigranti tutus per ea loca transitus esset. Hos igitur Alexander, bipartito agmine, aggressus intra quadraginta dies perdomuit. of the memory of their former comradeship that he had been unable to restrain his tears, a brave man, who had deserved well of the king, although blameless, would have suffered severe punishment because of his affection for his friend.

But in order for a time to call away his mind from grief, the king undertook an expedition into the land of the Cossaei.^a They dwell in the mountains near Media, a rude and warlike race, accustomed to live by plunder. From that people the kings of the Persians were wont to purchase peace by an annual tribute, to prevent them from running down into the land below them and infesting it with brigandage. For when the Persians resorted to force they had easily defeated them, defended as they were by the ruggedness of the places in which they took refuge whenever they were overcome by arms. They were also placated by annual gifts, in order that the king on his return to Babylon from Ecbatana, where he regularly spent the summer, might have a safe passage through those lands. These people, then, Alexander attacked with his force in two divisions, and completely subdued them within forty days. For after being often defeated by the king himself and by Ptolemy, who was leading one part of the army, they surrendered to the victor, in order to recover their men who had been made prisoner.

Alexander gave orders that strong cities be founded in strategic places, for fear that when the army was withdrawn the savage race might throw off the yoke. Then he moved his camp, and in a leisurely march, in order to give rest to the soldiers, who were wearied by the recent campaign, he went on to Babylon. And already he was only thirty stadia distant from the city, when Nearchus, whom he had sent ahead to Babylon by way of the Ocean and the mouths of the Euphrates, met him, and entreated him not to think of entering the city, which was destined to be fatal to him. He said that he had learned this from the Chaldeans, who had already abundantly proved the credibility of their art by the result of many predictions.^a The king, influenced by the reputation of the Chaldeans and by their persistent assertion, having sent many of his friends to the city, led the army by another road past Babylon and pitched a permanent camp 200 stadia from the city. But, advised by the philosopher Anaxarchus, he scorned the warnings of the Chaldeans, whose teachings he thought false or superfluous, and entered the city. Thither deputations from almost the whole world^b had flocked together. After giving attentive audience to these for several days, he then turned his thoughts to the obsequies of Hephaestion. These were celebrated with such great and general devotion that there was no king up to that time whose funeral rites they did not surpass in the greatness of their cost and the magnificence of their equipment.

After this a longing seized the king to sail over the river Pallacopas to the lands of the Arabians; having arrived there and having discovered a suitable site for founding a city, he settled in it those of the Greeks who were disabled by age or by wounds, as well as any who had remained behind of their own volition. When these things had been finished to his satisfaction, now at ease about the future, he laughed at the Chaldeans because he had not only entered Babylon but also had left it unharmed.^c But in fact, as he was returning through the marshes which the Euphrates makes by pouring into the Pallacopas,^d a direful omen was offered. For some overhanging branches dragged the diadem from the king's head and cast it into the river. When after this prodigies were announced one after the other, continual sacrifices were offered to avert them, at the same time by Greek and by barbarian rites.

Nevertheless they could not be expiated except by the king's death. And when he had entertained Nearchus with a banquet and he was already about to go to bed, he yielded to the urgent entreaties of Medius of Larissa^a that he would come to him for a drinking-bout. After he had drunk deeply there all night, he began to feel ill. Then his illness grew so much worse that within six days it had so exhausted all his strength that he could not even speak. Meanwhile the troops, overcome by anxiety and longing to see him, although their leaders warned them not to burden the king in his illness, extorted permission to be admitted to his presence.

V. As they gazed at him, their rising tears gave the impression no longer of an army looking upon its 2 king, but of one attending his funeral; yet the grief of those who stood about his couch was still greater. When the king saw them he said: "After I am gone 3 will you find a king worthy of such men?" Incredible to tell and to hear of, he continued to hold his body in the same attitude in which he had composed himself when he was about to admit the soldiers, until he had been saluted by the whole army for that last time. And having dismissed the common throng, as if he had discharged every debt to life, he threw 4 back his exhausted frame, and after bidding his friends to seat themselves—for his voice too had already begun to give out—he drew his ring from his finger^b and handed it to Perdiccas, adding instructions that they should order his body to be taken to Ammon.

5 When they asked to whom he left his kingdom, he replied, to him who was the best man,^c but that he ing about and as if crazed, they had filled that city, great as it was, with grief and sorrow, omitting no complaints which sorrow suggests in such a disaster; 9 therefore those who had stood without the royal quarters, Macedonians and foreigners alike, rushed together. And in their common sorrow the van-the Persians, calling upon a most just and mild lord, the Macedonians upon the best and bravest of kings, and his aspect as he led his soldiers to battle, besieged cities, scaled walls, and rewarded brave men before the assembled army, were before their minds' eye.

24 cruel death. At last she gave way to grief and veiling her head and turning away from her granddaughter and her grandson, who fell at her knees, she at the same time abstained from food and shunned the light of day. The fifth day after she 25 had resolved to die, she passed away. Surely her death is a strong testimony to Alexander's indulgence towards her and to his just treatment of all the captives ; for she who had had the fortitude to live after Darius was ashamed to survive Alexander.

26 And, by Heaven! to those who judge the king^a fairly it is clear that his good qualities were natural, 27 his faults due to his fortune or to his youth. He possessed incredible strength of mind, an endurance of toil which was almost excessive, a courage excelling not only among kings but among those whose sole 28 merit it is, a generosity that often bestowed greater gifts than are asked of gods in prayer, clemency towards the vanquished, shown either by returning so many kingdoms to those from whom he had taken 29 them in war or by giving them as gifts, a constant contempt of death, the fear of which appals the rest of mankind, a desire for glory and renown which, although it was greater than was proper, yet was to be overlooked in a young man who had done such 30 glorious deeds ; also his devotion to his parents, of whom he had decided to consecrate Olympias among 31 the immortals and had avenged Philip, his kindness to almost all his friends, his goodwill to his soldiers, 32 his wisdom equal to the greatness of his spirit, and a keenness of judgement of which one of his years could hardly have been capable, a restraint of immoderate desires, the indulgence of passion only within natural requirements, and to have enjoyed

no pleasures except such as were lawful, were certainly gifts of his own nature.^a

33 The following qualities were attributable to his fortune : to equal himself with the gods and to aspire to divine honours, to trust to oracles which advised such conduct, and to be more angry than was fitting with those who refused to venerate him, to change his attire to that of foreign nations, to imitate those customs of the conquered^b races which he had scorned 34 before his victory. As for his hot temper and his love of wine, just as these were intensified by youth, 35 greater age might have moderated them. Yet it must be confessed that although he owed much to his own merit, yet he owed still more to Fortune, over whom he alone of all mortals had control.^c How often did she save him from death ! How often, when rashness brought him into danger, did she protect 36 him by perpetual good luck ! She likewise fixed the same end for his life and for his glory ; the Fates waited for him until, having thoroughly subdued the Orient, and having reached the Ocean, he fulfilled every task of which mortality was capable.

37 This was the king and leader for whom a successor was sought, but the burden was too great for the shoulders of one man ; hence even his name and the fame of his exploits spread kings and kingdoms throughout almost the whole world, and those were considered most glorious who had retained even the least part of so great a fortune.

VI. But in Babylon—for it was from there that I made a digression^d—his body-guards called to the royal quarters the chief of the king's friends and the leaders of his forces. A throng of soldiers followed, eager to know to whom the fortune of Alexander number of soldiers, had been unable to enter the royal quarters, since a herald forbade access except to those who had been summoned by name. But this order, 3 being of uncertain origin, was disregarded. And first of all the great wailing and lamentation was renewed, then expectation of what was coming checked their 4 tears and caused silence. Then Perdiccas, having put in view of the public the royal throne, on which were the diadem and the robe of Alexander together with his arms, placed on the same throne the ring which had been handed to him the day before by the king.

At the sight of these the whole assembly again burst into tears and renewed the mourning, and Per-5 diccas said: "For my part, I return to you the ring handed to me by the late king himself, with which he was wont to seal the documents pertaining to his 6 kingdom and his power." Furthermore, although no calamity equal to this which has befallen us can be devised by the angry gods, yet those who consider the greatness of what he accomplished may well believe that so great a man was merely loaned to mankind by the gods, in order that, when his allotted service to humanity was completed, they might quickly take 7 him back into their own family. Therefore, since nothing else is left of him except what is always separated from immortality,^b let us pay as soon as possible the rites due to his body at least, not forgetting in what city and among whom we are, and of what a chief and what a king we have been attention and consider how we may secure the victory which he has won among those from whom it was won. We have need of a head ; to name one is in your power. One thing you must know, that a throng of soldiers without a leader is a body without 9 a soul. It is five months from the time when Roxanê became with child ; we pray that she may bear a son, who shall rule over us with the gods' approval, when he comes of age. Determine by what men you wish to be ruled in the meantime." Thus spoke Perdiccas.

- 10 Then Nearchus said that no one could deny that only the blood and stock of Alexander was suited to 11 royal majesty, but that to wait for a king who was not yet born, and to pass over one who was already living, suited neither the desires of the Macedonians nor their exigencies ; that the king had a son by Barsinê^a ; he ought to be presented with the crown.
 12 His speech was approved by no one ; and so, clashing their shields with their spears after their custom, they persisted in uproar. And already, as Nearchus maintained his opinion too persistently, they had almost reached the point of mutiny, when Ptolemy 13 said : " Truly a most worthy stock to rule the race of the Macedonians is the son of Roxanê or Barsinê, whose very name Europe will be ashamed to hear, since it is that of one who is in greater part a captive.
 14 Is that why we have conquered the Persians, that we may serve their stock, a thing which those legitimate kings, Darius and Xerxes, sought in vain with armies of so many thousands and such great fleets ?
 15 My advice is this, that the throne of Alexander be set up in the royal quarters, and that those who were summoned to his counsels should come together whenever there shall be need of general consultation, and that what the majority of them shall decide shall stand approved,^a and that the generals and commanders of troops shall obey those men."

- 16 Some agreed with Ptolemy, fewer with Perdiccas. Then Aristonus^b began to speak, saying that Alexander, when he was asked to whom he left his kingdom, wished the best man to be chosen; moreover, he had himself judged that Perdiccas, to whom he 17 had handed his ring, was the best man. For he was not the only one who sat by Alexander when he was dying, but, the king, looking about, had chosen him from his throng of friends to give it to. Therefore it was Alexander's wish that the supreme power 18 should be bestowed upon Perdiccas. And there was no doubt that Aristonus' opinion was the truth. Therefore all bade Perdiccas to come forward and take up the king's ring. He wavered between inclination and shame, and believed that the more modestly he sought what he coveted the more persistently they 19 would press it upon him. So, after delaying and being for a long time uncertain what to do, he finally retired to the back part of the assembly, and stood behind those who were nearest to the throne.

- 20 But Meleager, one of the generals, taking the courage which the hesitation of Perdiccas had aroused, said: "May the gods themselves not permit that the fortune of Alexander and the burden of so great a kingdom should fall upon such shoulders; certainly men will not allow it. I say nothing of those of nobler birth^c than this fellow, but only of brave men, who need to endure nothing against their 21 will. And truly it makes no difference whether you have for king the son of Roxanê, whenever he shall be born, or Perdiccas, since that fellow will usurp the royal power under the guise of regency.

That is why no king pleases him except one who is not yet born, and amid the great haste ^a of all, which is not only reasonable but even necessary, he alone waits for the completion of months, and already divines that a male child has been conceived. And could you doubt that he is even ready to suborn one?

- VII. And already there was a large body of armed men ^b around Meleager, and the assembly was on its way to sedition and discord, when a man unknown to most of the Macedonians, one of the lowest of the common people, said: "What need is there of arms and civil war, when you have the king whom you

- 6 Therefore with persistent acclamation they declared that they would tolerate no other king than one who had been born to such a hope, and they ordered
- 7 Arrhidaeus to be called. Him Meleager, being hostile to Perdiccas, whom he hated, promptly brought into the royal quarters, and the soldiers hailed him as king under the name of Philippos.
- 8 But this was the voice of the common people, the opinion of the chief men was different. Of these Pithon began to follow the plan of Perdiccas, and named Perdiccas and Leonnatus, both born of royal stock, as guardians of the son to be born of Roxanê.
- 9 He added that Craterus and Antipater should have direction of affairs in Europe. Then an oath was exacted of each man that they would submit to a
- 10 king begotten of Alexander. Meleager—naturally terrified for fear of punishment, he had withdrawn with his partisans—again burst into the royal quarters dragging Philippos with him and crying that his vigorous youth favoured the hope which they had just conceived for the new king; let them only try the offspring of Philip, son and brother to two kings; let them trust their own judgement rather than that of others.

- 11 No deep sea, no vast and storm-swept ocean rouses such great billows as the emotions of a multitude, especially if it is exulting in a liberty which is new
- 12 and destined to be short-lived. A few were for giving the power to Perdiccas, who had recently been chosen, more to Philippos, whom they had scorned. But they could not favour nor oppose anything for long, and now repented of their resolution, and now of the very fact of having repented. At last, however, their
- 13 favour inclined to the royal stock. Arrhidaeus had left the assembly greatly alarmed by the authority of the leading men, and as he went out the favour of the soldiers was rather silenced than diminished; hence, on being recalled he put on the robe of his brother, the very one which had been placed upon
- 14 the throne. And Meleager, having put on his cuirass, armed himself as an attendant upon the new king. The phalanx followed his example, clashing their spears against their shields as a sign that they would sate themselves with the blood of those who
- 15 aspired to a rule to which they had no claim. They rejoiced that the strength of the empire^a would remain in the same house and family; that the inheritance of empire would defend the royal stock; they were accustomed to honour and venerate the name itself, and no one assumed it unless born to rule.
- 16 Therefore Perdiccas in terror ordered the room in which the body of Alexander was lying to be bolted; he had with him 600 men of tried valour, Ptolemy

17 also had joined him and the royal band of pages. But the barriers were easily broken through by so many thousands of soldiers. And the king^a also had rushed in, surrounded by a throng of attendants, of whom 18 Meleager took the lead; accordingly, Perdiccas called aside those who wished to protect the body of Alexander. But those who had broken in were throwing javelins at him at long range. And after many had been wounded, at last the older men, taking off their helmets in order to be more easily recognized, began to entreat those who favoured Perdiccas to cease from war and yield to the king and to superior 19 numbers. Perdiccas was the first to lay down his arms, and the rest followed his example. Then, when Meleager tried to persuade them not to leave the body of Alexander, they, thinking that he was looking for an opportunity for treachery, through another door of the palace took flight in the direction of the 20 Euphrates. The cavalry, which was composed of the noblest of the youth, in great numbers followed Perdiccas and Leonnatus, and advised leaving the 21 city and encamping in the plains. But Perdiccas did not give up hope that even the infantry would follow him; and therefore, for fear that by leading away the horsemen he might seem to have separated from the rest of the army, he remained in the city.

VIII. But Meleager did not cease to warn the king that his right to rule ought to be confirmed by the death of Perdiccas; that if his ambitious spirit were not checked, he would start a revolution. That he remembered what he had deserved of the king, and besides no one was wholly loyal to one whom he

as a command and sent men in the name of the king to summon Perdiccas. They were directed to kill 3 him if he hesitated to come. Perdiccas, when the arrival of the messengers was known, attended only by sixteen youths of the royal cohort, took his place on the threshold of his house, and after upbraiding the messengers and repeatedly calling them slaves of Meleager, he so terrified them by the firmness of his courage and his expression, that they fled almost 4 beside themselves. Perdiccas ordered the youths to mount their horses and came with a few of his friends to Leonnatus, intending now to ward off violence with a stronger force, if anyone should offer it.

5 On the following day it seemed to the Macedonians shameful that Perdiccas had been exposed to danger of death, and they decided to go and punish by arms 6 the rash act of Meleager. But he, having foreseen a revolt, when he had come to the king began to ask him whether he himself had ordered Perdiccas to be seized. The king replied that he had ordered it at the instigation of Meleager, but that they ought not to make a disturbance ; for Perdiccas was alive.
 7 Therefore when the assembly had been dismissed, Meleager, terrified especially by the desertion of the cavalry and not knowing what to do—for he had fallen into the very danger which he had shortly before devised for his enemy—spent nearly three 8 days in considering uncertain plans. And in fact the former appearance of the royal quarters continued ; for envoys of the nations came to the king, and the leaders of the forces were present with him, and armed men and attendants had filled the vestibule.

itself was a sign of extreme desperation, and suspecting one another, they did not dare to approach nor to talk with anyone, but turned over secret thoughts each in their own minds, and from comparison with the new king longing was aroused for the one whom they had lost.

- 10 They inquired where he was whose rule and auspices they had followed ; they had been deserted amid hostile and unsubdued nations, who would seek to inflict punishment for their many disasters, when-
- 11 ever an opportunity was offered. They were eating their hearts out by such thoughts as these, when it was announced that the cavalry who were under Perdiccas, having taken possession of the plains around Babylon, had held back the grain which was
- 12 being transported into the city. In consequence, there began to be at first scarcity and then famine, and those who were within the city maintained that they ought to come to terms with Perdiccas or fight
- 13 with him. By chance it had so happened that those who had been in the fields, fearing a devastation of the farmhouses and villages, were fleeing to the city, and that the townspeople, as provisions were failing them, were going out of the city, since to both classes the abode of the others seemed safer than their own.
- 14 The Macedonians, fearing some disturbance from these, went in a body to the royal quarters and expressed their opinions. But it seemed best for envoys to be sent to the cavalry to discuss ending
- 15 the discord and laying down arms. Therefore the king sent Pusias the Thessalian and Damyllus of Megalopolis and Perilaüs. When these had delivered the king's message, they received the reply that the horsemen would not lay down their arms unless the king should surrender, the ringleaders of the discord.

16 When this reply was announced, the soldiers of their own accord armed themselves. Philip, called from the royal quarters by their tumult, said : " There is no necessity for an outbreak ; for those who rest quiet will seize the prizes of those who engage in 17 mutual strife. At the same time remember that you are dealing with citizens, and that hastily to snatch from them the hope of grace is the part of 18 those eager for civil war. Let us try by a second deputation whether they can be reconciled. And I believe that, since the body of Alexander is not yet buried, all will unite to pay this pious duty which 19 we owe him. So far as I am concerned, I prefer to return this authority of mine rather than to exercise it at the expense of the blood of fellow-citizens ; and if there is no other hope of harmony, I beg and entreat you, choose a better man."

20 Then with tears in his eyes he took the diadem from his head, and extended his right hand, in which he was holding it, so that if anyone claimed to be 21 more worthy he might take it. This very moderate speech aroused great hope of his character, which before that day had been obscured by his brother's fame. Accordingly, all began to urge him to consent 22 to carry out what he had planned. Again he sent the same envoys, to ask that they should receive Meleager as a third leader. This was granted without difficulty ; for Perdiccas wished to separate Meleager from the king, and thought that alone he 23 would be no match for the other two. Therefore when Meleager came out to meet him with the phalanx, Perdiccas received him at the head of the squadrons of cavalry. Both armies exchanged salutations and united for ever, as they thought, in firm concord and peace.

IX. But already by the Fates civil wars were being forced upon the Macedonian nation ; for royal power desires no associate ^a and was being sought by many.

- 2 First therefore they brought their forces into collision, then separated them ; and when they had weighted the body with more than it could carry, the limbs^b also began to give out, and an empire that might have endured under one man fell in ruins while it was 3 being upheld by many. Therefore the Roman people rightly and deservedly asserts that it owes its safety to its prince,^c who in the night which was almost our 4 last shone forth like a new star.^d The rising of this star, by Heaven ! rather than that of the sun, restored light to the world in darkness, since lacking their head the limbs were thrown into disorder.
5 How many firebrands did it extinguish ! How many swords did it sheath ! How great a tempest did it dispel with sudden prosperity ! Therefore our empire 6 not only lives afresh but even flourishes. Provided only that the divine jealousy be absent, the posterity of that same house will continue the good times of this our age, it is to be hoped forever, at any rate for very many years.

- 7 But to return to the series of events from which the contemplation of the public happiness had diverted me, Perdiccas rested the sole hope of his safety on the death of Meleager ; he thought that a man who was vain, faithless and quick to revolt, and his own bitterest enemy, must be attacked first.
8 But he hid his design with deep dissimulation, in order to crush him when he was off his guard.

Therefore he secretly suborned certain men from the troops which he commanded, who were to make open complaint, as if he himself knew nothing of it, that Meleager had been placed on an equality with 9 Perdiccas. When their talk was reported to Meleager, furious with anger at Perdiccas, he told him what he had learned. He, as if terrified by something of which he knew nothing, began to give utterance to surprise and complaint, and to show a pretence of displeasure; finally, he agreed that the authors of such seditious 10 talk ought to be arrested. Meleager embraced and thanked Perdiccas, and strongly commended his 11 loyalty and goodwill towards him. Then after consulting together they formed a plan for chastising the guilty parties.

It was decided to purify the army after the native fashion, and the past discord seemed to furnish a 12 reasonable cause for this. The kings of the Macedonians had been accustomed to purify the soldiers in the following manner^a; having disembowelled as dog in the farthest part of the plain into which they were going to lead the army, they throw the flesh on both sides; within that space all the soldiers stand under arms, on one side the cavalry, on the other 13 the phalanx. Accordingly on that day which they had appointed for this sacred ceremony the king with the horsemen and the elephants stood facing the 14 infantry which Meleager commanded. Already the cavalry force was advancing, and the infantry, not wholly recovered from the sudden fear caused by the recent discord and expecting something, hesitated for a time whether to withdraw their forces into the city—for the plain was advantageous for the horse-15 men—; but fearing to condemn the good faith of their fellow-soldiers without sufficient reason, they halted, their minds prepared for fighting if anyone should offer violence.

Already the forces were coming together, and there was only a short space which divided the two lines.
 16 Then the king with one wing of the cavalry ^a began to ride up to the infantry, demanding for punishment, at the instigation of Perdiccas, the authors of the discord, whom he himself was bound to protect, and threatened to lead all his squadrons against them, 17 as well as the elephants, if they refused. The infantry were dumbfounded by the unexpected danger, and not even Meleager himself had longer either judgement or courage. It seemed safest in the circumstances rather to await their fate than to 18 hasten it. Then Perdiccas, seeing them paralysed and in his power, separated from the rest about thirty who had followed Meleager when he rushed forth from the first assembly which was held after the death of Alexander, and in the sight of the whole army cast them before the elephants. All were trampled to death by the feet of the beasts, while 19 Philip neither prevented nor authorized it; and it was plain that he would not admit anything as his own act except what the result should justify.

This was an omen and a beginning of civil wars 20 among the Macedonians. Meleager, learning too late the treachery of Perdiccas, for the moment calmly kept his place in the formation, since no violence was offered to his own person, but pres-

Perdicas, having led the army into the city, held a council of the leading men, in which it was decided that the rule should be so shared that the king ^a should in fact hold the chief authority, that Ptolemy should be satrap of Egypt ^b and the African races which were under the jurisdiction of the 2 Macedonians; to Leomedon ^c was given Syria with Phoenicia, to Philotas ^d Cilicia was assigned, Antigonus was ordered to hold Lycia with Pamphylia and Greater Phrygia, Cassander was sent to Caria, Menander to Lydia; they ordered that Lesser Phrygia that borders upon the Hellespont should 3 be the province of Leonnatus. Cappadocia fell to Eumenes with Paphlagonia; he was ordered to defend that region as far as Trapezus and to wage war with Ariarathes; he alone declined his assign-4 ment. Pithon was ordered to hold Media, Lysimachus Thrace and the Pontic nations adjoining Thrace. It was decided that those who were in charge of India, and those in charge of Bactra, the Sogdiani, and the others who dwell near either the Ocean or the Red Sea ^e should retain command and hold rule over the territories of which each had charge; that Perdicas should remain ^f with the king and command the forces which followed the king.

5 Some have believed that the provinces were distributed by Alexander in his will, but we have learned that the report of such action was false, although handed

parts of the empire were distributed, they each continued to protect their own holdings as they themselves had fixed^a them, except that no landmark could ever remain fixed in the face of unlimited 7 ambition. To be sure they had not long since as servants of the king, under pretext of exercising a delegated authority, individually usurped huge kingdoms, occasions for controversy having disappeared, since they were all of the same race and each one was separated from the rest by the situation
 8 of his province. But it was difficult to be content with what occasion had granted them; for all first possessions seem mean when greater ones are hoped for. Hence it appeared to them all more convenient to increase their realms than it would have been to accept them as they were.

9 It was the seventh day since the king's body had been lying in its coffin, for the attention of all was diverted from so solemn a duty to the establishment 10 of public order. And no more burning heat exists than that of the region of Mesopotamia, so great that it destroys many animals which it overtakes on the bare ground; such is the heat of sun and sky, 11 by which everything is burned as by fire. Springs of water are rare and are hidden by the deceit of the natives; their use is available to them, but is unknown to strangers. I report what is recorded 12 rather than believed: when at last his friends had leisure to care for Alexander's lifeless body, those who had entered the room saw it corrupted by no decay, nor even by the slightest discoloration. The vigour too which comes from the breath of life had after their manner, at first, as if he were still breathing, did not dare to lay their hands upon him ; then after praying that it might be right and lawful for mortals to handle a god, they emptied the body of entrails, the golden coffin was filled with perfumes, and the emblem of his rank was placed upon the king's head.

- 14 Many believed that he had been slain by poison ^a ; that a son of Antipater among his attendants, Iollas by name, had administered it by his father's command. Certain it is that Alexander was often heard to say that Antipater took upon himself the state of a king, that he was more powerful than a prefect ought to be, and that he was puffed up by the rich spoil and fame ^b of his Spartan victory while he claimed
